To the Reader.

Entle if you be, be you so, gentle Reader ;
you shall understand, that I know not when, there came a Post, I know not whence, was going I know not whither, and carried I know not what : But in his way I know not how, it was his hap with lack of heed to let fall a Packet of idle papers, the superscription being onely to him that finds it, being my fortune to light on it, seeing no greater stile in the direction, I fell to opening the inclosure ; in which I found divers Letters written, to whom, or from whom I could not learn. Now for the contents of the circumstances, when you have read them, judge of them ; and as you like them, regard them : And for my self, hearing you like well of this first Part, I have ad-ventured a second, which here I present you with, both in one : But fearing to be too tedious in this Letter, lest you like the worse of those that follow, I rest as I have reason,

Yours

A Complemental Letter.

Dear Friend,

he elegant composition of your lines makes me to esteem you a deep Scholar, and the remembrance of your love towards me, makes me glory in so exquisite a friend. With what an estate of comfort shall I be ravished by your company, who surfeit thus with joy at the paper which bears the characters of your name and handwriting, which writing truly is most delectable but not satisfactory: For I cannot derive a fulness of content to my self, though I were made possessor of both the Indies, or had the assistance of all outward commodities; if I ever be deprived of your society, which I account the greatest moiety of all terrene happiness, who am resolved still to continue my sorrow for your continued absence, and request you to hasten the hour wherein I may congratulate your safety, and abridge my time of mourning with a speedy and most welcome return unto

Your devoted friend, A. B.

From a Son to his Father.

VWhereas it is the part of every christ being by duty and nature chiefly bound, daily to sollicite God with importunate prayers for his Parents prosperity; I therefore good Father, being a Son more bound then any, through the sweet bounty of a Fathers love, do now in all reverence obediently remember my zeal and duty, with my fervent prayers for the continuance of all true felicity towards you, whose love hath been the flow to fill the banks again, when my irregular expences were the ebbe-tides to make my money run low; but as I am insufficient to make a plenary retribution, or cancel the obligation of your so many kindnesses and benefits, so will I never forget to shew my grateful remembrance: but being ashamed to return nothing but bare words in re.

retribution, I have at this present sent you a Gelding; whose worth I leave to your trial and experience, and desire you to accept him as the rental tribute of

A Letter of Love to his Mistress.

Loveliest Mistress,

That powerful Deity which hath inkindled the hearts of mightiest Monarchs with the beautiful tinctaments of Rôle-checked Ladies, at this time hath manifested her sovereignty over me; who being taken in the snare of Love, and fettered in the bonds of affection, am in the same predicament of passion. The countless griefs which day and night I have long endured for your sake, (able to melt a heart harder than a Diamond) may be an perplexing matter to more your pitiful nature to favour me. And my languishing estate both implor, (if you hath my life in any regard) that you would purchase by your kindness to cherish my soul, which is prepared to forsake this mangled body upon denial. But fearing lest I have too much slackened the reins of my pen, and been too liberal in writing, awaiting in your answer for the sentence of life or death, wishing you a perpetuity of joy, I rest, Yours most affectionately, A. B.

A Letter admonitory to a Gentlewoman living in London.

It is observable, that when a man hath a glass of brittle substance, and for the worth great of price and value, he is very chary and careful thereof; because if by a fall it should be broken, it is impossible to have it repaired. I make the application unto your self (Cousin Dorothy) your Maiden-head being a jewel of high estimate, may be compared to that brittle ware, which unless your care be the greater for the preservation, may get a crack that no art of man can make whole again, and a blow that no herb is of sufficient efficacy to cure. Let not my needful advice be in it part accepted, the trespasse being so irreparable, and the loss so irrevocable. Your Sex (Cousin) is of it self prone and propense unto pleasure, and London is a place full of provocations to sin; your beauty shall there hourly meet with forcible temptations, though bapty in the harmless Countrey the fortrefs of your Chastity stand no assistants. But I hope your genuine and innate vertue will protect you from so foul an ignominy, and give me cause to rest always,

Your loving Cousin, G. D.

A Letter to his Mistress desiring marriage.

Courteous Mistress Amy, the onely sop of my heart, I thought it fitting to declare my mind in writing to you: long time I have rested your true and constant Love, hoping to find the like true affection from you. I write not in any dissembling sort, my tongue both declare my heart, assuring you that I do not regard any portion, but your hearty love to remain firm to me. I would be glad to know when you would appoint a day of our marriage, if it stand so to your liking. Dear Amy, take some pity on him that loveth you so well: you know that I have been proffered good mens daughters in marriage, but I could never fancy any so well as your self: I desire to know the fullness of your affection, whether it do equal mine or no; and upon the receipt of your answer, you shall see me shortly after. Though I receive you in your smock, I have sufficient means to provide for me and you both. I have sent you a Ring in token of love, which I pray you accept of. I omit all eloquence, not doubting but you will consider my fervent zeal, which cannot be expressed with words. Thus requesting your answer, I commit you to God, resting

Your assured loving friend till death, H. K.

A merry Letter of news of Complaints.

Honest George, my old School-fellow and kind friend, glad to hear of thy home quiet, however it fare with my hard travel. Whereas thou writest unto me for such news as this place yieldeth, let me tell thee that there are so many, and so few of them true, that I dare almost write none: onely this upon my knowledge I dare deliver thee for truth, That of late in the City there are a number of complaints every hour in the day: The Soldier complains either of peace or penury, the Lawyer either for lack of Clients or cold Fees, the Merchant of small Traffick, or ill fortune, the Tradesman for lack of Chapmen, the Laborers for lack of work, the poor men of lack of charity, and the rich of lack of money: the Chief for lack of botties, and the Hangman that his trees are bare: And for your feminine gender, many old women cry out for young unthrifts, and many young wenches complain of old misters: Whosoever matters go, I cannot help them; but as I hear of their complaints, I have written thee the contents, which being scarce worth the reading, I leave to thy worst using; and so sorry that I have no matter of worth wherewith better to fit thy humor, in as much kindness as I can, I commend my love to thy command, and so I rest, Thine ever as my own, W. P.

To a virtuous Gentlewoman.

I will not deny but your fair eyes are able to dart love into any beholder, but the virtues of your mind hath won me to be enamored on your person. They that aim at the form, see their loves but to an apprenticeship of beauty, which broken with sickness or years, they grow either cold in their affection, or fall to a loathing on their once beloved object. But I (considering of your wisdom, and supporting my hopes upon the pillar of your patience) put it to your election either to grace me with your favour, whose love shall be as durable as the immortal essence of your soul, from whence flow your never enough commended virtues; or to cast it on some superficial and temporary lover, whose affection will fade with the decay of your soon vanishing beauty. But I will here set a period to my lines, and give way to your discreet consideration to contemplate and discuss of the most affectionate suite of

A Letter of comfortable advice to a Friend, who sorrowed for the Death of his Love.

Honest Alexander, I hear thou art of late fallen into an extreme melancholy, by reason of the sudden departure of Susanna out of this life. For thy sake I am sorry she hath left her passage on this earth, though being so good for this world, she is sure gone to a better. Now if thy mourning could recover her from death, I would willingly bear part of thy passion; but when it doth her no good, and thy self much hurt, let not a wilful humor lead thee into a wilful consumption. Thou knowest she is senseless in the grave, and wilt thou therefore be wise in the world? Say love is extreme, and let me believe it, wilt thou therefore deprive nature of reason, God forbid. Well, thou knowest I love thee, and in my love let me advise thee not to go from thy self with an imagination of what was, to lose that which is: Because she is in Heaven, wilt thou be in Hell, or if she be half an Angel, wilt thou be more than half a Devil? Oh spend thy spirit to a better purpose; let not the remembrance of her perfection drive thee into imperfections; nor make love hateful to others, by seeing the unhappiness caused in thy self. Oh let not fancy show folly in thee, howsoever virtue deserved honor in her. Leave thy solitary dwelling, and come live with me, we will devise some Toime god means for the remote of this melancholy. In the mean time make not too much of it, lest it chance to prove a madness. Love thy self, and believe thy friend, and what is in me to do the god, command as thine own. Glad I would be to see thee, as he who doth entirely love thee: and so desirous to hear from thee, to the Almighty God I commit thee. Farewell.

Thine as his own, E. D.

His Answer.

KAnd Frank, I have received thy friendly Letter, and note thy careful love; but pardon me if I do not answer to thy liking. Alas, how can he truly judge of love, that never kindly was in love; or know how soundly to help a sorrow, that never inwardly felt it? Reading makes a Schollar by rule, and observation (I know) doth much in the perfection of Art; but experience is the Mother of knowledge. My Distresses beauty was no Poon-thine, whose virtue gave light to the hearts-eye; no; her wisdom an ordinary wit, which put reason to his perfect understanding: And for her graces, are they not written among the virtuous? Thou saidst well, she was too heavenly a creature to make her habitation on this earth; and is it not then a kind of hell to be without her in this world? Imaginations are not dreams, where substances are the objects of the senses, while the eye of memory is never weary of seeing. Oh honest Frank, think thou hast not lived, that hast not loved, nor canst live in this world to have such a love die in it; it is a dull spirit that is fed with oblivion, and a dead sense that hath no feeling of love. Think therefore, what was, is with me, and my self is nothing, without the enjoying of that something, which was to me all in all. Is not the presence of an Angel able to ravish the sight of a man? And is not the light of Beauty the life of love? Leave then to burden me with imperfection in my sorrow for her want, whose presence was my Paradise, whose absence is my worlds hell. Thou dost misconstrue my god, in languishing for her lack, and knowest not my heart, in thinking of any other comforts. No Frank, let it suffice, though I love thee I cannot forget her; and though I live with thee, yet I will die for her: Have patience then with passion, till time better temper mine affection: In which, most devoted to thee of any man living, till I see thee (which shall be as shortly as I well can) I rest,

Thine as thou knowest, D. E.

A Letter of advice to a young Courtier.

My noble kinsman, I hear of late you are grown a great Courtier, I wish you much grace, and the continuing of your best comfort; but for that your years have not had time to be much, and your kindness may hap to be abused, let me intreat you a little now and then to look to that which I counsel you: keep your purse warily, and your credit charity; your reputation valiantly, and your honour carefully: For your friends, as you find them use them: For your love let it be secret in the bestowing, and discreet in the placing; for if fancy be wanting, wit shall be a fool. Scorn not Ladies, for they are worthy to be loved; but make not love to many, lest thou be loved of none. If thou hast a favour, be not proud of thy fortune, but think it discretion to conceal a contentment: Go neat, but not gay, lest it argue a lightness; and take heed of lavish expence, lest it beggar thy estate: Play little, and lose not much; use exercise, but make no toil of a pleasure: Read much, but dull not thy brain; and confer but with the wise, so shalt thou get understanding. Wide is a kind of coyness, which is a little womanish; and a common familiarity is too near the Clown for a Courtier: But carry thy self even that thou fall on neither side, so will the wise commend thee, and the better sort affect thee. But let me not be tedious, lest it may perhaps offend thee; and therefore as I live, let it suffice I love thee: and so wishing thee as much good as thou canst desire to be wished, in prayer for thy health, and hope of thy happiness, to my utmost power I rest in affectionate good will,

Thine ever assured, H. K.

His Answer.

Sweet Cousin, I think you have either some Court in the Countrey, or else you have studied the Courtier, that you can set down such rules that are no less worthy the reading, then observing believe me they shall be my best leisure studies, and in my daily courses my Counsellors, my Solicitors in love, and my Judges in honour; my Guides in greatest hope, and my Admonitors in greatest dangers. For your pains in them I thank you, and for your kindness I love you; your care of me I see by them, and will not unkindly forget them. I must confess, I find Courtiers close people, and Ladies strange creatures, and love so idle an humour, that I am afraid to lose time in it; but the better by your advice, I hope to carry a hand over it. For apparel I will keep my stint, and care for no fond fashion: And for exercise, nature is so given to ease, that

that god qualities are almost out of use. As for Murther, you Lady, she is scarce able to live with her prison: but for steepe I have little to me so much company withdwelveth me: and for a Book next the Bible, your Letter shall be my Library. And thus smiling at such galls, as think no grace but a gray coat, nor wit, but in a scale vest, noting many a beggar like a King, and many a Lord like a poor Gentleman, seeing the truth of Solomon in his conclusion of all earthly comforts, that all under the Sun is vanity; meaning not to be a servant to a base humour, nor to reach higher then I may hold fast. In thankful kindnes for thy careful Letter, and faithful affection to thy worthy self, wishing thee so near me that I might never be from thee, I rest, Thine what mine own, N. B.

A mournful Letter to a Brother.

God Brother, the misery of my uncomfortable life, the crossness of my cruel fortune, and the unkindness of my natural kinn, have made me so weary of this world, that I long for nothing but my latest hour, and yet loth to despair of Gods mercies, willing to take any good course for my commodity. I have of late been perswaded by some of experience in their journeyes into those parts, that my travel into the Loio Countreys would be much to my benefit, as well for the language, as for my skill in such Traffick, as I would make use of in those places; but my state bring so down the wind, that I know not how to set sail in the weather, having no stock to lay out, to give me hope to bring in: I will even set up my rest upon the resolution of fortune, and thrust my self into some place of service in the Wars, where I will either winn the Horse, or lose the Saddle: If I die, mercy is my comfort; if I live, desert is my hope. But to the helping forth of this my forlorn spirit, god Brother put to your helping hand, assuring your self that I will not like to be ungrateful: For as my heart loveth, my soul shall pray for you: and when I have time to see, I will be no stranger unto you. And thus aggrieved to charge, never more meaning to trouble you, beseeching God to enable me to requite you, in the true love of a natural Brother, I rest,

Yours as my own, M. S.

His Answer.

Dear Brother, as I grieve at your crosses, so I would as willingly procure your comforts: But my state much inferiour to my will, makes me unable to satisfie your expectation: and yet would I hurt my self self rather then you should perish: For you shall receive by this bearer what I may, and more as I shall be better able. But touching your comes for the Low-Countries, I fear your Traffick will be but little gainful, the Wars to eat up the wealth of the Country: And for your intent touching Arms, I fear your forwardness is too great for your experience. Yet so far I do allow of your noble resolutions herein, as I would less grieve to hear of your honourable death abroad, then see your discontented life at home; and therefore for winning the Horse, or losing the Saddle, leave that to Gods blessing, who will bestow Honour as it shall please his Divine Providence. But god Brother have patience with thy crosses, attend mercy for thy comfort, and have a care of home, howsoever thou farest abroad. I know thy mind is great, but take heed of pride, lest it be a bar to all thy preferment, and overthrow all thy honour. I see thou art weary of the world, make then thy way towards heaven, that God who hath tried thee with calamities, may bless thee with eternal comforts: In hope whereof, willing in all I can to help, praying heartily for thee, with my unfeigned hearts love, unto the Lord of Heaven I leave thee.

Your loving Brother, D. S.

To a Minister in the behalf of a sick Friend.

SIR, though it hath ever been my study to furnish my self with constancy against the disastrous infortunities of this life, yet I could not but be much moved out of the tenderness of my love; with the news of our friend Master Cuddards debility: And assure you, sickness hath not so vehemently seized on his body, but sorrow hath as violently attached my heart. For the recollection of his many labours so liberally, though undeservedly bestowed upon me, makes me to participate in his grief, as if it were mine own. Since it would be rudeness in me now to trouble him, I have directed my Letters unto you, and beseech you (seeing in all mens opinion, the time is come that he must put off his mortality, and pass through death, as through a gate into everlasting life) to put him in mind to bewail his misdeeds, and to beg remission of his sins, with pouring out of his tears, which are so gracious in Heaven; that every sin is washed away with such a flood, and no weeds spring after such a rain. But haply it is a superfluous care in me, to let a spur in your shoe, and to prick you on, who are forward enough of your self to perform all holy offices that can be in one of your coat required: Therefore if sorrow hath been a bad Dictator to my pen, bear with the boldness of

A Letter of a jealous Husband to his Wife.

Wife, in as much manners as I can, I advise you to leave such company, as is neither to your credit, nor my contentment: you know much company causeth many occasions of idle speeches, and young men are not in these days given to speak the best of their kind friends:
trifles and toys were better refused then accepted, and time idely spent brings but beggary or a worse blot. Of all the birds in the field, I love not a Cuckow in my house: truly I do not dissemble with you, your light behaviour doth much dislike me, and how glad I would be to have it reformed, you shall know when I see it. Shall I make you fine to please another, and displease my self? Shall I leave you my house, to make an hospitality of ill fellowship? Fit me not with the fool, howsoever you sad your self with a stout humour: Shake off such acquaintance as gain you nothing but discredit, and make much of him that must as well winter as summer you. Look to your house, have a motherly care over your children, let your servants to work, and have an eye to the main chance:
Leave satling gossips, idle huswives, vain headed fellows, and needleless charge, so God will bless, and the world will thrive with you, your neighbours speak well, and I shall truly love you. And thus hoping that you will by this my secret admonition, have a care of your good carriage, I rest in hope of your well doing.

Your loving Husband, T. P.

Her cunning answer.

Husband, with as much patience as I can, I have read over your unwise Letter, wherein jealousy keeps such a stir, that love doth but laugh at such idleness: much company breeds alway evil thoughts, and for soles it is good to be afraid of. Had I wit: All thoughts beget ill speeches, and old dogs bite sooner then a young whelp: For beggary let it fall upon the foolish, I know how to work for my living:
and for blots, I speak to scribes, for I have no skill in writing. Now for the Bird, to answer you with the Beast, I think a Calf in a Closet is as ill as a Cuckow in a Cage. If I were fallen you would sure suspect my humour, and do you dislike my merry behaviour? Well, your conceit may be reformed, in being so wrongfully informed, to have me so suddenly reformed: my fineness is your countenance, and my conversation your credit: and therefore do you shake off your loose reason, I will make choice of better company: Your house will stand fast if it fall not, and your children quieter then their father:
your your servants earn their wages, and the main chance is nicked well enough: Women must talk when they meet, and men not be scorned, though not entertained; and he that keepeth a house must seek to defray the charge. And so hoping you will leave your jealousy, and think of some matter of more worth, as careful of my carriage as you of your credit, meaning to do as well as I can, without your teaching, and as well as if you were at home, I rest,

Your too much loving VVife, H. P.

A Letter of kind complements to a Friend.

Kindest of friends, where I love much I speak little; for affection hath small pleasure in ceremonies: Your kindness I have found, my desert I dare not speak of, lest it more offend my self to think on, then you to look on: But since you have made me happy in your acquaintance, let me not so long lack your company: For though I live among many good neighbours, yet do I much want the comfort of so good a friend, by whom I should not onely gain the use of time, but find the profit of my desire: which joyning issue with your humours, cannot but so concur with your contentment, that if there be a Paradise on earth, I hope to find it in the fair passages of our loves, which grounded on vertue, and growing in kinonels, cannot chuse but be blessedly fruitfull. In brief, till I see you, I will mourn; and if not the sooner, I shall languish; for my wishing and want cannot be satisfied with absence. Hasten therefore your coming, and make your own welcome: For what I have or am, enter into the roll of your possession, where in the free-hold of my love, I assure the substance of my life. And so leaving complements to tongue spirits, in the truth of an honest heart I rest, Yours as you do, and shall ever know, N. B.

His Answer.

SIR, I have received your kind Letter, and I find you very fine at your corner: You will speak and say nothing; be eloquent in plainness: but you must not speak in the clouds to them that are acquainted with the Sun; and say what you will, I must believe of my self as I list: For indeed I know my own unworthiness of your commendation, in which I will rather bear with your affection, then be conceited with your opinion. Yet not to be either disdainfull, or ungratefull, be not so far deceived in my disposition, that wherein my presence may pleasure you, I will answer you with my absence, not long long delay your expectation; for excuse is but cold kindness, and too much haste is not fit; therefore as soon as I conveniently can, I assure you you shall see me, and in full measure with your affection find me, to the utmost of my power, rather in action then protestation, during life, in fair weather or foul, Yours as my own, W. R.

A Letter of Love to a Gentlewoman.

FAIR Sisters, to court you with eloquence, were as ill as to grieve you with fond tales: Let it therefore please you rather to believe what I write, then to note what I speak: For my heart being fired in your eyes, hath solwed my service in your beauty; in which finding reasons admiration, I can think but of nature in her perfection; in which, being ravished above it self, craveth of your favour to be instructed by your kindness; I mean no farther then in the obedience to your commandment: For if I be any thing my self, it shall be nothing more then yours, and less then nothing, if not yours in all. I could commend you above the Skies, compare you with the Sun, or set you among the Stars, figure you with the Phoenix, imagine you a Goddess; but I will leave such weak praising fictions, and think you only your self, whose vertuous beauty, and whose honourable discretion in the care of a little kindness is able to command the love of the wise, and the labours of the honest, with the best of their endeavours in the happiness of your employment to seek the height of their fortune. Think not therefore I flatter you in hope of favour, but honour you in the desert of worthiness; in which if you would vouchsafe to entertain the service of my affection, what you shall find in my love I will leave in your kindness to consider: In the care of which comfort, craving pardon for my presumption, I rest humbly and wholly.

Yours devoted to be commanded, F. W.

Her Answer.

SIR, I have heard Schollars say, that it is art to conceal art, and that under a face of simplicity is hidden much subtilty, of which how silly women need to be afraid, I will leave wise men to consider: And though I cannot in fine or fit terms answer the curiosity of your writing, yet after a plain and homely fashion I will intreat you to accept of my writing. Perfection and corruption cannot meet together in one subject, and therefore my imagined beauty, being but a shadow of deceit, be.

lieve not your eyes, till they have a better speculation; and for the inward parts of commendations, I am perswaded that wit is not worth any thing, that is drawn into admiration of nothing: only this not unkindly to requite your good thoughts of little worth, leaving fictions to idle fancies: Let me intreat you not to mistake your figures, and to honor a better substance then my unworthy self. And yet so far to assure your desert of my contentment, that wherein I may conveniently counterbail the rare of your kindness, excuse my indiscretion, if I fail of my desire: in which wishing you more happiness, then to be commanded by my unworthiness, I rest as I may,

Your loving poor friend, M. W.

A Letter of scorn to a coy Dame.

Mistris Subs, if you were but a little fair, I say you would be mighty proud; and had you but the wit of a Goose, you would surely kiss the Gander: but being (with as bad qualities as can be wished) as rich as a new shorn sheep, I hope fortune is not so mad as to bless you farther then the beggar. It is not your holiday face, put on after the ill-favoured fashion, can make your half nose but ugly in a true light; and but that you are exceedingly beholding to the Cavallo, you might be set up for the sign of the Sea-Crab. Now for your Parentage, to help out with the hope of the rest, when the Tinkers son and Coblers daughter met under the hedge at the milking of a Bull, within forty weeks after, what fell out you know. Now not so plainly to lay open the foul members of a filthy carcass, but as patiently as I can to keep decorum in your disgrace, let me tell you, that all this and much more being true in your disgrace, I cannot chuse but marvel that you mourn not to death in imagination, to think that a monster in nature can have any disgrace in reason: but let it be as it is, I have but lost a little breath in talking to a deaf ear, for I mean to take no more travel to the subject of so ill an object: And therefore meaning to take my farewell, and beginning with you both at one instant, leaving you to loath your self, as one whom no creature can be in love with all, sorry that I ever saw you, and never more intending to trouble you, in recompense of your coarse entertainment, I rest in all kindness this present and all-ways,

Yours as much as may be, T. E.

Her Answer.

Master Wildegoose, it is not your busy tussy can make me afraid of your big looks: for I saw the play of ancient Pistol, where a crack-Coward was well cudgell'd for his knavery: Your railing is so near the Rascal, as I am almost ashamed to bestow so good a name as the Rogue on you: but for modesty sake I will a little forbear you; and onely tell you, that a hanging look and a hollow heart, a cunning wit and corrupt conscience, make you so fit a Mate for the Devil, that there is no Christian will desire your company. Now for your state, it is much on fortune, which brings many of you fellows to a deadly fall, when the pain of their heads is onely healed with the halter. And for your Linage, when the Bearwards Ape, and the Hangmans Donkey met together on a Hay-mow, what a whelp came out of such a Litter, let all the world judge, I say nothing. Now for your stump feet, and your lame hand, saying kindly with your wry neck, who would not make little of their eyes, that could endure the sight of such a picture: Now your wealth being but a few words, which you have almost all spent in idle humors, hoping that the Tortoise will not quarrel with the Crab, and that when you have spt upon your Ale, you will get a medicine for your madnes, till the Woodcock tell you how the Daincock hath caught you, leaving further to think on you, more then utter to loath you: glad that your entertainment was so much to your discontentment, in full measure with your malice, I rest, Yours as you see, A. W.

A Letter to a foul Dowdy.

Mistress Jones Juggle, I hear that you think your self fair, but you are much deceived; for the Carriers oyl is but a coarse kind of painting; and for wit, how far you are from understanding, the wise can tell you. Now for qualities, where you learned them I know not, but if you could leave them it were well. I wonder not a little what madnes hath possessed your brain, that you can make so much of you self: Are your eyes your own; or are they so sealed they cannot see? Get you to your prayers, and leave making of love, for age and evil favor had need to be helped with a good purse. I hear you study musick: indeed when the Owl sings, the Nightingale will hold her peace; but for shame learn not to dance, for a Barrel can but tumble: But would you use a medicine for your teeth, you might be the better to speak with in the morning. What aites you to buy a Fan, except it be to hide your face, and till your hands be whole, you will wear but Dogs Leather for your Cloves:

In truth you abuse your self, that you keep not your Chamber; for none sees you but laughs at you, or at least loaths to look on you: be therefore content to do as I wish you, speak with none but by Attourney, leave the Painter to better Pictures, and rather grieve at Nature for framing you, then to think of any thing that may help you: your goods besell on me for my counsel, and make suit to death for your comfort. And thus hoping that being weary of your self, you will hasten to your grave, I end,

Yours as you see, H. I.

Her Answer.

SIR, Morris Mallipart, you may think your self wise, but you do not shew it: For railing words are the worst testimonies for a good wit. For good qualities I think you know them not, nor can go from the evil; but for madness I think it sorteth best with your humours: For the help wherof, it were good that you were let blood in the brain: But for ill sight, who is so blind as old Bapard, that will not see his own folly: My prayers I will not forget to God, to blese me from such foul spirits on earth: And for love more then charity, I hold you the farthest off in my thought. How knowing your poverty, I wonder you will speak of a purse. As for an ill-favoured face, go to Paris garden to your god Brother. Indeed your Croyden sanguine is most pure complexion: but for your Tobacco it is a good purge for your rheume. For my Fan, it keeps sometimes from the sight of such a Wizard as your good face; and for my hands, I keep my nails on my fingers, though you cannot keep your hair on your head. How for laughing at fools, you are provided for a corcomb; and for loathing all ill countenances, let the Hangman draw your Picture. Be therefore contented to be thus answered, speak wisely, or hold your peace, and be not busie with your betters, lest you know the nature of Had-I-will. So hoping that you will be weary of the world, and that you will hang your self for a medicine to heal your wits of melancholy, I will bequeath you a halter upon fra-rost at your pleasure, and so I rest,

Your friend for such a matter. E. P.

A Letter for the preferring of a servant.

SIR, knowing your necessary use of a good servant, and remembering your late speech with me touching such a matter, I thought good to come commend unto you in that behalf the bearer hereof W. T. a man whose honest secrecy and careful diligence upon a reasonable tryal will soon make proof of his sufficiency. His Parentage is not base; nor his disposition vile, but in all parts requisite as one of his place; such a one as I am perswaded will fit your turn: If therefore at my request you will entertain him, I doubt not but you will thank me for him: For I was glad I had so truly a servant to commend unto you, and hope to hear he will much content you. And thus loth to trouble you with further circumstances, leaving his service to your good regard, my love to your like commandment, in affectionate good will I rest, Yours ever assured, N. B.

The Answer.

SIR, I have received both your Letter and the bearer, both which I will make much of for your sake; for in the one I will often see you, and in the other remember you. Your commendation of him argueth your knowledge of a sufficient warrant for his worth; which I will as kindly and thankfully think on: his countenance I like well, and his speech better: and for the performance of my expectation, I am the better perswaded of his discretion: When I see you, you shall know how I like him; in the mean time he shall find that I will love him: and for all things necessary for his present use, I find him sufficiently furnished: but if I find his want, it shall be soon supplied. So thanking you for sending him, and wishing you had come with him, remaining your kind debtor till a good occasion of requital, with my hearty commendations I commit you to the Almighty,

Your very loving friend, R. V.

A Letter of counsel to a Friend.

My best approved and worthiest beloved Philo, I hear by some of late come from Venice, that seem to be somewhat inward in thy acquaintance, that thou art of late fallen into an amorous humor, especially with a Subject with too much unworthiness; a news, that knowing thy spirit I could hardly believe, that upon a solemn affirmation I was loath to hear: For beauty without wealth is but a beggarly charme, and honour without vertue is but a title for a title. Hath she a glib tongue, it is pity she hath not a better wit: is she witty, it is a sorrow it is no better bestowed; for the craft of one woman is the confusion of many a man: Does she say she loves thee, believe.

believe her not: nay, both she love thee, regard her not: for it is a sequel of so little worth, as will give but less in the buying. I feared the plague had taken hold of thy lodging, but thou art peppered with a world of infection; thy study is infected with idleness, thy brain with oddities, and thy spirit with madnels. Leave these follies, think love but a dream, and beauty a shadow, and folly a witch, and repentance a misery: wake out of thy sleep, and call thy wits together; be not tossed with a humor, no; slave to thy self-will: Leave courting of a Curtezian, and keep thy breath for a better blast: Save thy purse for a better purpose, and spend thy time in more profit: Let not the wise laugh at thee, and the honest lament thee: For my self, how I grieve for thee, I would I could tell thee; but let thus much suffice thee, believe nothing as she saith, care for nothing that she doth, no; give her any thing that she wants: see her, but to purge melancholy; talk with her, but to sharpen wit; give her, but to be rid of her company; and use her, but according to her condition. So shalt thou have a hand over those humours, that would have a head over thy heart, and be Master over thy servants by the vertue of thy spirit: otherwise, Will having gotten the bridle in his teeth, will run away with the Rider; and Reason being cast off, may never sit well in the saddle. But why do I use these persuasions for the remove of thy passions? If thou be soundly in, thou wilt hardly get out: if thou be but over-thrown, thou mayest be saved from drowning: whatsoever I hear, I hope the best; but to avoid the worst, I have presumed out of my love to send thee the fruit of my affection. In which, if my care may do thee comfort, I shall think it a great part of my happiness; howsoever it be, I commit the consideration to thy kindness: And so till I hear from thee, which I daily long for, I rest,

Thine as mine own, E. D.

His Answer.

Gentle Millo, I have received thy most kind and careful Letter, a messenger of my most honest love, who hath told me no less then I wholly believe; that love in idleness is the very entrance to madnels: But yet though I will think on thy counsel, give me leave a little to go along with conceit. Wherefore let me tell thee my opinion: Beauty without wealth is little worth; but being a riches in it self, how can it be poorly valued; and Honour being but the state of vertue, how can you pluck a little out of it? The tongue is the instrument of wit, and wit the approver of discretion: where, if Reason be gravelled, Nature may be admired. Now for words, they have their substances, and love is not not to be abused: For it is a sence well known, that is worthy of his price. Infections are every where, and jealousy a most cruel plague; but tis thy self of that disease, and fear not thy health in the other: Reason is a kind of dizziness, which worse tormented them with idleness, is troubled with too strong a madness: but he that is unwise had need be reformed, and he that laughs at an imperfection, may fall himself upon the fool. Now for a mad dream, or an imagined witch, conceited sleep, or an intreated waking, I must confess they are pretty humors, and will think of their errors: and now for sopping and slavery, and for court-ing in knavery, be persuaded that time will employ my purse to better purpose: then grieve not for me, but only love me, and let that suffice thee: and for thy advice in seeing, talking, and giving, fear not the had-I-wist of thy folly: for he that is Master of himself, shall not need his Dis-tricks, and therefore he that cannot ride, let him leave the saddle: for rea-son hath a pointer over wit, where wit is but a servant to Nature: In the certainty of which course, intending so to lay my hands on my heart, that I will fear no horns on my head, with many thanks for thy kind persuasions, hoping thou wilt take no exception at my constructions, intreating thee to believe no more of me then thou needest, and to love me as thou dost, in the faith of that affection that holds thee dear to my love, I rest during life.

Thine obliged and devoted, W. B.

A Letter of comfort to a Sister in Sorrow.

DEAR Sister, I heard lately of your husbands departure for the In-dies, when with no little sorrow I considered your heavy case: In which finding his want to be grievous, and you friends told in com-fort, I could not chafe without unkindness, but remember these lines of my love unto you: I know your state is weak, how fair soever you make your weather: but the more is your patience worthy of honour, that can so nobly conceal your discontentments. For my self, I would I were able to do you good: but what I have or can procure, shall not fail to do you pleasure: But if your mind be too great to stay to be be-holding, what I am able to do, take as a duty in my Brothers love. Good Sister therefore be of good cheer, and put your care upon me, I will see you often, and love you ever: For a creature of your worthiness is sel-dom found in your Sex, that for her Husbands love will adventure the state of her living. Your children are not many, but such as are, shall be mine, and you to be as my self: take therefore as little thought, and as much comfort as you can; no doubt but God that trieth his servants will will bless them; I hope then of my brothers happy return, and till then commend me. Shortly God willing you shall see me: in the meantime let me intreat you kindly to accept this little token of my greater love, which is but an assurance of the beginning of my affections never ending; in which predicament of true friendship, I rest ever assured,

Your loving Sister, E. W.

The Answer.

Sweet Sister, I have received your kind Letter, and loving token, for both which I am your thankful debto: but touching my husband, though his wants were grievous, yet the want of him is my greatest sorrow; for in the stay of his love was the stay of my living. I am sorry that you know my weakness, and wish it but in strength to answer your kindness. But good Sister, though I am willing to conceal my crosses, to be beholden to so honourable a Spirit, I count it not the least of my happiness: Therefore though I had devoted my self to solitariness in his absence, your company shall be to me a light in darkness; and noting the nature of your kindness, will ever be beholding to your love: Come then to me when you will, and command what you will, for I will be as good as you will. My children are my wondrous loves and my hearts jewels, in whose face I would behold their fathers, in whose love I would spend my life. So in a merry-go-sorry grieving for his absence, and wishing your presence, praying for his happy return, your health, and my own patience, that in too much passion of affection I fall not upon indiscretion, with most hearty thankful love I commend my self to your commandment.

Yours affectionately bound, E. G.

A Letter of Love to a fair Mistress.

Fair Mistress, to trouble you with a long circumstance, I might perhaps fear you with the toils of time, and to make an end ere I begin might argue little care in my conceit. But to avoid both superfluous, let me a little intreat you with patience to peruse in a few words the sum of a long tale: in which the truth of love, to the latest hour of death, professeth the joy of his life, but the fruit of your labour, of which the thought of the unworthiness doth so much to his unhappiness. Time makes me too brief, but in your misfortune is my hope of understanding, that in my trial you may trust me, and by desert esteem me; in which if I deserve your expectation, let me die in the misery of your disdain. Thus got to chatter you with a fair

file in the state of your worthy commendation, beseeching to be commanded by the kind care of your discretion in the hands of a vowed service I humbly rest, Yours always assured, R. O.

The Answer.

SIR, as I would be loth to be thought proud, I would as unwillingly be found idle: either to believe so well of my self, or not to have a respect of others. Truth is seldom masked with smooth words, and love is not bred but upon great contentment. Your liking may be greater then my desert, and so alter upon a better consideration. But mistake not your happiness in my labours unworthiness, where the best of my commandment may be the best of your contentment. Your consideration of time may excuse my shortness of writing; where in a word you may understand, that indeed I intend; that truth is honourable in love, and virtue the fairest joy in affection: in which, if I do not misconstrue your conceit, I will answer the care of your kindness. In which, according to the due of desert, you shall find the effects of your desire. And so for this time I rest,

Your poor friend, A. Q.

A Letter of counsel from a kind Father.

DEAR SON, you must not from your Father look for a flattering love, nor take it unkindly that I give you warning of what may prejudice your good: Above all things serve God, and keep a clear conscience: pass not the limits of allegiance, nor build castles in the air: converse not with fools; for you shall lose your time; take heed of knaves, for there is much to be feared in them; and beware of drunkenness, for it is a beastly humour. I have heard you are given much to Alchymistry; it is a great charge to many, and profiteth few: employ your time so, that you lose not by the bargain. What a grief it is to want, I pray God you never know: and therefore eschew prodigality, which quickly makes a poor man. I have sent you an hundred Crowns, well may you use them; and when you need any more send to me for them. After the Term the Vacation will call thee into the Countrey, where knowing thy Fathers house, thou mayest make thine own welcome, till when and always I will pray for thee, that God will bless thee, that I may have joy in thee.

Your loving Father, H. W.

A kind answer of a loving Son.

M<sup>y</sup> dear Father, as I will not flatter my self with your love, so I cannot but say in your kindness, whose careful counsel within the compass of so few words I will lock up in my heart as my best jewel. For to serve God is the duty of a Christian; and no longer let me live, then in the care of that comfort. A clear Conscience I find like a Sanctuary, where the soul may take a safe place of rest. To pass the Limits of Allegiance merits the loss of life, and to build Castles in the air they are but mad mens imaginations. Fools cannot understand me, and Snakes shall not trouble me. For drunkenness never doubt me, for it is most loathsome in my nature. For your Closures I humbly thank you, and hope to bestow them to your liking. Touching Alchemy, I hear much, but believe little; but I will not wait your land to make a new metal. The vacation is near, and I will not be long from you: where finding you well, shall be my best welcome. So praying for your long health, and hearts ever happiness, in all humble thanks I take my leave.

Your obedient Son, R. W.

A Merchants Letter to his Factor.

As I have reposed trust in your care, I look for your performance of my credit: Your ability in managing such matters as I have committed to your charge I make no doubt of; and therefore hoping in your discretion to hear of my expected contentment, I will look by your next Letters to hear of the sum of my desire: In the mean time let me tell you, that I sent you fourscore broad Cloaths, and thirty Berries, with other such commodities as I think fit for your use in those parts. I pray you make your best market, and take heed to whom you credit; for as I hear there are men reputed of great wealth, in suspicion of playing bankrupts; have therefore the more care of your business, your travels shall not be unconsidered. Your French Wines I hear this year are very small, and your Caskoin Wines be very dear, Wines cheap: but you know your markets, and I hope you will have a care of your money, for it is hardly come by, as this world goes, doth much in great matters. If there be any news of worth acquaint me with them, and in any wise do not trouble me with untruths. Your Cousin tells me that you are in good regard with the Governour, for certain cloaths that you lately bestowed on him: he told me the cause, and therefore I commend your discretion; for sometime it is better to give them to save. In sum, let this suffice you without further circumstance; you have my love and my purse,

I pray you have a care of both. So till I hear from you, I rest,
Your loving Master, T. P.

The Answer.

SIR, I beseech you misgiving not your trust; nor have any fear of my care: For having both your love and your purse, how can the one let me forget the other. So Sir, be your assurance, howsoever Bankers play bankar out, patrons will deceive no credit. And touching such affairs as I have in charge, doubt not of my dispatch. Your Cloaths I have received, and like them very well; your Kervies are very good, I would you had sent more of them; for they are much in request, and well sold. I have by god hap met with an hundred Tun of Calcoin Wines upon a good market, as you may know by my Note. Wines are good, and good cheap, and therefore I have sent you greater store of them; on the Fats you shall find the Pack, with two Letters of your name. By the next post you shall hear what I need: in the mean time having no intelligence of worth, loth to trouble you with trifles, glad to perform that duty that your kindness hath bound me to, wishing to live no longer then discharge the office of an honest care, praying for your long health and everlasting happiness, I humbly take my leave,

Your faithful servant, M. W.

A Letter of Challenge.

Many wrongs are so many, that may no longer be digested; your excuses so idle, as I will henceforth despise them: For your words are but wind, and therefore I am weary of them. And if you be not so cold in complexion, that you dare maintain your reputation, meet me to morrow early in the morning in some Field a mile out of Town, and bring with you such Arms as you do ordinarily carry: Assign your place and hour, and fail not your appointment, that God the Judge of Right may determine our wrongs, and the point of the Sword may put a period to our discourses. Thus having blown over an idle paper with a few last words of my intent, answer me as I expect, or hear of me as it will fall out, in haste,

Your enemy till death, T. P.

The Answer.

What you have written to me, I return upon your self, as loth to lose time in answer of idle insolencies. If you durst go alone,

A Packet of Letters.

I would go with you; but let it suffice that I know you, and therefore mean not to trust you: but bring a friend with you, and I am ready for you, come to my lodging as early as you will. And though I would be loath to break a sleep for you, yet I will take a little pains to answer you. As for the Field, we will cast lots for the place, where God and a good Conscience will quickly determine the quarrel; but I fear the point of the sword will make a Commotion to your counting, which if it do, you shall find what will follow. And so leaving farther words, wishing you to be as good as your word, I stay, Yours as you mind, T. W.

A Letter to a Friend for News

C Duffin, I know you that live abroad in the world, cannot but hear of Petus every day, which we in the Countrey would be glad to do and then to be acquainted with your labour will not be much to you, and for your kindness it shall not be unrequited. We hear much murmuring of many things, but little truth of any thing; but from you that know, I would be glad to learn. There is a speech among some tolle Astronomers, that the Sun in the Moon hath fallen in love with a Star, and walking through the Clouds, was almost drowned in the water; and that the Tumblers in the Forrest have spoiled a number of black Conies, so that Rabbits are grown so dear, that a poor man may be glad of a piece of Button. It is said here with us in these parts, that you in the City are much troubled with a new disease; truly we have reasonable good health; but that there are such plagues in others houses, what with Mewed wives and bad husbands, Rabboyn children, and wicked serpents; that many an honest man cannot live in quiet with his neighbours. Though the Spring be not very farward, yet there is a great increase of things, especially of Children, which how they may answer the Law, I will greatly stand upon. Thus having no matter of moment, wherewith at this time to trouble you, intreating you that I may shortly hear from you, I rest in much affection,

Yours Affarely yours, R. Q.

Affuredly yours, R. Q.

His Answer.

My good Cousin, to answer your kind Letter, if there were any thing here worth the writing, I would not have been so long silent. But such are the occurrences in these places, as are either not worth the noting, or better concealed then written. For love in youth is full of tenderness, and malice in age is so malicious, that vertue is hid in corners, that there is little or nothing spoken of her account. For the Man in the Moon, I leave him to wait on the Sun; but if he have a mind to any Star, I leave him to follow that Owl light. For his watry Clement, since it is all in Clouds let it hang in the Air, I will not meddle with the love of Astronomy. For Comes I am no Warrener, therefore let them that have the keeping of the grounds look to their games; I have small sport in such idleness; but for a piece ofutton, a young Lamb is worth five old Conies; and he that is not glad of such a feast, let him fast for his dinner. For our new Diseases, it is with many men in the head, and women in the tongue. Servants grow great Libertines, and Children are sick of their Parents: And for Neighbours, there is so much love in the streets, that there is almost none in the houses. And therefore besides other ordinary diseases, we want no plagues to make us to look into our sins, but God amend all, for one will scarce amend another. And therefore intreating you to have patience with me till the next week, when you shall hear of the best news that comes to my hands, I rest in all bounden good will;

Yours as much as may be, M. F.

A dissuasive from Marriage.

Sweet Cousin, I am sorry to hear, that being so well at ease, you will cozen your self of quiet; and for want of a worlds hell, you will put your self in Purgatory with a Wife. But if it may be that I speak in time, hear what I say: If she be fair, it may breed jealousy; if foul, dislike and change; if rich, take heed of pride; if poor, misery; if young, belovate the wanton; if old, take heed of the Bedlam; if wise, she will govern thee; if foolish, fret thee; how dear soever she loves thee, she will sometime or other either cross thee or crown thee: And therefore if thou wilt be ruled by a friend, let neither old nor young, fair nor foul trouble thee. Believe me as I have read, these are the properties of most wives, to weaken strength, to trouble wit, to empty purses, and to breed humours. But if I be deceived in my reading, and my Author in his writing, either in altering your course, or probing your comfort, tell me your mind when we meet: Till when, wishing the continuance of that quiet wherein you now live, or the true contentment of the best love; leaving to your own discretion the managing of your affection, I commit you to the Almighty, Tuine what mine own, N. B.

His

His Answer.

GOOD Cousin, I find your kindness above your knowledge, in mistaking Paradise for Purgatory: For a Wife is the wealth of the mind, and the welfare of the heart, where the best judgment of reason finds discretion contentments. May be, is a doubt; but what is, must be regarded; in which sense I am pleased. Where Youth with Beauty; and Wit with Vertue hath power to command, there kindness must obey. Poverty I fear not, and wealth I seek not; But it sufficeth me to seek no other fortune for the sum of my worlds happiness, where the abiding of evil, and the hope of good, makes me know more comfort then you are able to conceive, till you enter in that course, wherein the top of love is the second blessedness of this life. What shall I say, but that I know not what to say, to express the perfection of this pleasure, which puts down all idle imaginations; from which hoping to see thee removed when I see thee, till then and ever I rest,

Thine as thou knowest, D. E.

A kind Letter of a Creditor for money.

SIR, I pray you take it not unkindly that I write thus earnestly unto you: for more necessity then will hath urged me to it. My money is not so much as you well able to discharge it. My losses by Sea, and ill Creditors by Land make me strain countesse with my friends for their help in an extremity, yet do I desire nothing but my due. But as I was ready to lend, I would be glad to receive with that solace, of good will, that may continue our kindness. I write not this as doubting your discretion, but to intreat your patience, if your purse be not in time; for were I as I have been, and hope to be, I could rather bear to long, then ask too soon, especially of so good a friend as I have alwayes found of your self. Consider therefore of my case, and in your kindness answer me. Time is precious, and therefore lost by disappointment. I be disappointed, and so perhaps discredited, I pray you speed your answer, which howsoever shall be welcome. And therefore earnestly intreating you to help me now, that I may the better requite your kindness hereafter, with many thanks for your great labours which cannot be forgotten to be deserved; I take my leave further at this time to trouble you, but will rest in what I shall be able ever to pleasure you, to make you know how much I love you.

Your loving friend, T. R.

The

The Debtors Answer.

SIR, your request is so reasonable, and your kindness so much, that for a greater matter then you demand, if my purse were not in tune, I would strain my credit very far for you: Bear then a little with my forgetfulness of the Day, and think it not trouble to my patience to be put in mind of my credit. Your Sea-losses I am sorry for, and wish you recovery by land. Debtors that will not pay make Creditors they cannot lend: but for my self, to make you know how much interest you have in my affection, let me tell you, that though by some unexpected expences, I am short of my hoped reckoning; yet upon the receipt of your Letter I have been thus careful for you, your money I have sent you, and as much more for so long time I will lend you; which you shall receive of this bearer, and in my Letter the day of payment: which if it may please you so much as I wish you, I am glad I had it for you: Whosoever it fall out, use it to your own discretion, and so far be always assured of my love, that my word and deed shall be all one in your comfort. And so leaving ceremonious complements, in unforgotten god will I rest always to my uttermost power,

Yours as my own, L. W.

A Letter of News.

TO perform my promise in my last Letter, my kind and best Cousin, you shall understand of such occurrents as I hear go currant and so; truth. I hear there are certain old people that speak much of Prophecies; where they set it down for a certain Rule, that this year and many to come, he that wants money in his purse, and a friend in the Court, may walk in the Countrey, and pick straws for his comfort, for the Law is very dangerous: For begging and charity is so cold, that the poor must starve rather then the rich will want. Old men shall never be young again in this world, and beauty in a young woman will not let her know her self. Honesty without wit shall die on the Fowl, and craft without credit will labour to little purpose. In sum there will be a great Plague among the poor with lack of honesty; but it may be Nature may alter her course in many things, and Prophecies may fall out in contraries; howsoever it shall be welcome that comes in Gods Name: And so hoping thou lovest no Legerdemain, nor wilt be led away with blind Prophecies, writing this only of exercise for a merry humor, I rest, Thine what mine own, P. R.

The Answer.

Such idle Prophets as you meet with, have such kind of matter as you write of: But let the world wag as it list, there is not a truer wag in the world then thy self. And were it not that I fear my Letter would come to light, I would answer you in your kind. But to be short, let me tell you, That Lawes are good to take order with such Out-laws, as after prodigality put themselves upon charity. And yet to cross your rule of little experience, old men may have young humours, fair Wenches put wise men to their wits, and honesty may thrive with a mean trade; when a crafty knave may lose by his cunning broking. As for the plague, I fear it is never from you; for if neighbours agree, yet their wives may fall out; and while the poor fret and the rich frown, there is little hope of health, where the world is so out of quiet. And therefore hoping that you have wit enough to beware the knave and the fool; and to make your choise of the best company, wishing you continuance of your good humour, with thanks for your waggish Letter; I rest in our old league,

Yours as mine own, R. B.

A Letter perswading to marriage.

DEAR Cousin, I do not a little wonder at your solitary life, and more at your little care to match your self in marriage with some Virgin worthy your love. Will you leave the world without memory of your name, your inheritance to no issue of your own honour, and run a course of too little comfort? We thinke that your knowledge of the diversity of varieties should settle your content upon some special vertue. What if some women be aged, some are youthful, and some froward, other may be kind; and some wanton, there are better stayed; and some fallen, some are loving; and is there none can fit your humour? God forbid: The law of Nature, the law of Reason, the law of God both will it, that love breeds increase by a vertuous conjunction, which cannot be performed without honour of this course. Bastards will be witness of their Parents wickedness, when natural children are the joy of their Fathers, and a true loving Wife is worth a thousand wild Walkers: her care in the house, her kindness at the table, and her comfort in the bed, are pleasures better conceived then expressed: fall then aboard with such a Bird as you may hold for your Phoenix; and thinke thy mind at best liberty, when it is free from the bonds of folly. In fine, let me intreat thee to make thy house a home, thy wife thy worlds love, and thy children thy earths joys; which as I hope thou wilt be glad to have, I shall shall be glad to see: For good speed whereof, in hearty prayers I rest,

Your loving Cousin, R. W.

His Answer.

My kind Cousin, I see that you are better read then experienced: for Bachelors Wives and Widows Children are pretty things to play withall: but he that knows many dangers will take heed of all. A White is an everlasting substance, which if it be not of the better nature, is a perilous thing to meddle withall; for if it catch hold of the hands, it may put the heart to sore pain: and the Phoenix is such a Figure, as if I must find her in a woman, I fear me I must seek a great way for her. For the Lanes that you speak of, I yield to truth, but love is so nice a humor, that he seldom settles in a place. For Bassamus I love not the bees, and better Children will do well when they come. For ben and board, and those tricks, let them say in them that have them; when I find time I will think of them: in the mean time, more at quiet in my lodging with a friend, then perhaps I may be at home with a White, not for swearing Marriage, nor posting to Purgatory instead of mistaken Paradise, wishing the prayers for thy better happiness, then lovers solencies; and if I do marry, to be kindly matched, I rest, Thine ever as mine own, D. L.

A Letter of unkindness upon the denial of a Courtship.

If my defects had not exceeded my desire, I would have hated the nature of my humors, which loves nothing less then to be too much beloved. My request was not so much, and the grant but easie, howsoever for illustration the excuse may be cunningly framed. But though I conceive unkindness in this course, I can rather grieve then be angry, for I will mistrust my self till I see so much of my sorrow, and love my friend, though I be plain with his patience: be content therefore rather to let me tell you of my discontent, then to cover dissimulation, and to wish your better regard of my affection, which in denying a trifle may lose a greater benefit. But not to go too far in impatience, let me thus grow to an end: Friendship once grounded is not easily removed; and therefore being assured of my love, bear with my dislike, and wherein I may better please you, doubt not the full requital of unkindness; for I can chide and not be angry, and better love you then tell you so. And so intreating your reasonable answer for my satisfaction, I rest, all displeasure set apart.

Your loving friend, N. S.

His

My dear friend, I have just received your letter of the 10th inst. and am glad to hear from you.

Your numerous kind of writing puts me to sleep for an answer: For your anger without cause may prove cause of anger. You know you might command what I am, and will you have more? Conceit may be deceived, and so kindness abused; and Impatience both the least part of discretion. Excuses are the worst of friends, and therefore for you shall be deferred till our next time. When I hear your own faults, you will not think amends of your friend. When not then harshness adds, nor be carried away with conceit; and as you know my nature commands my love, which is far from the thought to make a friend behold- ing, be not discontent with a denial, till you have better reason of dis- pleasure; but measure me with your self, and you shall find small cause of difference: if there be any let kindness remove it, reason convince it, and patience bear it. So shall friends be the sweeter, and you and I shall not fall out. We hoping that you will forgive your self with this answer, till we meet to talk further of the matter. I conclude with your kindness, and rest ever,

Yours as you know, T. W.

A Letter to an unthankful Person.

I have heard that a Prince sometimes obtaining punishment of all offences, left ingratitude for the gods to plague, as past mans power to punish enough. The tale may well be true, considering the violence of such a nature, as I think the like liveth not in the shape of man. Couldst thou not only forget, but abuse my kindness, and so make a monster of a wicked man? I could not have believed it, had not I too well ex- pected it. But I wish you could leave that humour, lest it make a loath- some baseness; yet I will learn to know the condition of so much violence, and as well warn my friends from an enemy, as further abuse my own wit with the mistaking of a friend. In brief therefore let me tell you, as I know you I regard you, and as I know you I leave you: as an ill, if there lacken a care to be put into the world for a wicked help. And so I stop to have left so much time to write to you. I wish all the world that knows you to hate you.

Your enemy from the heart, Dr. M.

The Answer.

How strangely men will write, to show impatience with out of op- portunity! A good turn is lost, when it is cast into their careless teeth; and abuse will conceived can hardly be well excused. Consider better of what is done, then joining the meaning of a good friend, and you shall find without error, no true cause of dissatisfaction. If the consideration of matters have proven clearer without judgment, now more than others, the utility of your fortune. Against my self I will conclude nothing, but after time to decide all doubts, when truth shall show the differences between a thesis and a better substance. We leaving all humours to like minds, and your thoughts to better natures, hoping to find you your self, which will be far enough from that you wish, in spite of the Devil I commit you to God, and to I rest,

Your friend whether you will or no, D. R.

A Letter to laugh at after the old fashion

of Love to a Maid.

After my hearty commendations, trusting in God that you are in good health, as I was at the writing hereof, with my Father and my Mother, my Brothers and Sisters, and all my good friends, thanks be to God. The cause of my writing to you at this time is, that Margery, I do hear since my coming from Wakefield, when you know what talk we had together at the house of the Black Cockle, how you have given me your hand, and that you have not forgotten me for all the world; and how you have now a Ring and a Pearl, that cost me fifteen pence, which I left with you, and you gave me a Ring to wear in my hat. I thank you, which I shall wear in my being day. And I marvel, if it be true as I hear, that you have altered your mind, and are made sure to my neighbour Rogers younger Son. Truly Margery, you do not well in so doing, and God will plague you for it; and I hope I shall live and if I never have you; for there are many ways then making, and I count myself worthy the waiting after. And therefore praying you to write me your answer by this bearer my friend, touching the truth of all how the matter stands with you, I commit you to God from Galloway.

Your true Love, R. P.

Her Answer.

Truly Roger I did not look for such a Letter from your hands.
I would you should know I scorn it. Have I gotten my Fathers and Mothers ill will for you, to be soiled at your hands, I perceive it will be to reason already, you would be somewhat another way, I am glad I find you, that you can believe anything of me.

but it is no matter, I care not, send me my Raykin, and you shall have your Ring and your Beards, for I can have enough of it. I never let you make. For there are more Bachelors then Roges, and my penny is as good as your six pence. And therefore leting you are to leave, even put up your pipes, for I will have no more to do with you; and so unsaying all that ever hath been said betwixt us, make your choice where you list, I know where to be beloved, and so I end. From Wakefield.

M. R.

From a Father to a Son; advising against Suretyship.

My Son, I hope so well of your disposition, that you will not unkindly conceive of that which in love I write: for such is the nature of my affection, as I had rather be understood in careless advising you for your good, then found blinking at your sin. It is told me, which I am loath to hear, but would be more grieved to believe, that you are very ready to write your name under bills and obligations; by which, as well for your own sole expences, as to pleasure others in hurting your self, you begin to take up to say, that I fear you will be so soon taken down, that you will hardly ever rise again. Beware my Son, Suretyship is a pritty enemy to a good nature, which may sooner pay thee, then receive one; and therefore among other things that I would have you to take heed of, let suretyship be one of the chiefest. What you can spare your friend, deny him not; but as you love your liberty, beware of sealing and delivering. Play is but loss of time that might be better employed; for the gain is but ungracious, and the loss is often grievous; and therefore use it little, and rather for company then pleasure. Dancing is full of, but let not your legs sing away your wit, in wasting your wealth, spend by measure howsoever your musick make you dance. Be careful of thy speech, thrifty in thy expence, weary of thy company, and jealous of thy friend: serve God, and fear not the Devil; what thou needest, let me know, and in the care of my counsel let me see thy love; of which having no doubt, and therefore wishing thee all good, desirous shortly to hear from thee, I rest,

Your loving Father, L. W.

The Answer.

My dear Father, say be it from my heart to have an unkind thought of so kind a Father, in whose good advice, resteth the most part of my worldly happiness: What you have heard, I beseech you don not to believe of me. I have seen in others so great mischief and misery to ensue upon Idleness, that I rather wish never to write, then to subscribe me ruined: For I few pay their own debts, and so many pay for others, till they have nothing to pay for their own, that who keeps my friendship for that end, shall miss of my love to another; and therefore fear not what you hear, but believe what I say. Touching play, I love not to trouble my brain with solemnity, nor lose time in the abate of hope: For Dancing, as it is not an exercise that I do not dislike, so it is not so much my delight, but I can rather leave it then love it; but for my expences, fear not so much my little care of your charge, nor less regard of your love, in which under Heaven, holding my hearts chief happiness, in prayer for your health and hearts ease, I take my leave.

Your obedient Son, T. W.

To a familiar Friend.

HAVING little matter wherewith to entertain your expectation, I have been enforced to study for nothing. By this Bearer I know you look to hear from me; and to salute you with silence were a cold commendation: Let it therefore suffice to hear of my health, and the good passages of all the proceedings touching your Law causes, wherein if my love faint in labour, I will leave to be my self. Ere it be long I shall have occasion to come near you, when a few miles shall not be much out of my way to see you; when, if your Falcons be in tune, I shall be glad to see a sight. So soon as conveniently you may, I pray you let me hear from you; and if you come to the Town, let my house be your Inn; where making your own welcome, I hope we shall be merry. And thus for want of matter, briefer then I would be, I commend my love to your kindness, and to rest always,

Your assured loving Friend, M. P.

The Answer.

HE that hath his wits at commandment, needs little to study; and therefore being provided of invention, a little matter will serve the turn. If of nothing you make so much, what would you do with a little more? Thus I wit to meet with your humour, which in silence speaks more, then he who talks much to less purpose. In brief, for your kind Letter I thank you; for your care of my business I will have care of you, and for your self only I love you. If you have occasion to come down, use my house as your own. My Falcon hath killed a Partridge.

fringe, but of her sight I will make no bags; but when you come you shall be told that I am persuaded will like you in the mean time glad to hear of your health, the continuance, interest I heartily pray for, wishing as soon as conveniently I may to see you, that we may try a Course with our Gyppies for a fat Buck. Having now no matter of import wherewith to trouble you, with my most hearty commendations I commit you to the Almighty,

To a familiar Friend.

Either paper is scant, your affairs are great, or your spirit is lasse, that in so many weeks I have not heard from you, so much as you do. The cause I would be glad to know, so it be not such as I shall be loy to hear, that either lack of health, or liberty be not the cause of your silence: pray you therefore mend this little fault in friendship, to cease the trouble of imagination, and in a sufficient exercise let my thoughts at quiet; which being much disordered through want of your health, I have sent this bearer on purpose to you, whom I beseech you in all love return to me with all speed. As we have none worth the writing, and therefore knowing your spirit, desiring not to be troubled with toyes, in that hearty love as holds you as dear as my life, wishing no greater joy as comfort, then in the continual enjoying of your happy company, hoping shortly to see you here, which can be no longer then long wished, and shall be ever most welcome, in the unfeigned affection of a true friend, I rest,

Yours as mine own, N. B.

The Answer.

I perceive it is true, that I have often heard, that love is not without jealousie, but as fearful of hurt as careful of good: But to put you out of all doubts that may be some disquiet to your wished rest, let it suffice you to know my health as you left it, I thank God for it: my affairs are not much, but I could salute my friend; nor my spirit so lasse, but I could write a letter to my so much beloved; and to excuse my silence, let me tell you, that the last week I wrote to you by your Fathers Baylie, who, I marvel, hath not delivered it ere this time. In that letter you shall find my mind touching your suit in Court, which I fear, if it be tedious, will prove more chargeable then commendable: but observing a good course, a good opportunity may be prosperous. In my letter I have writ, written at full unto you, wherein I hope you will clear all suspicion of any fault in my silence, and expect my coming down ere it be long: In the mean time, with hearty thanks for all kindness, without any further needless complement, I rest,

Yours as my own, R. B.

A Love Letter.

I shall not like whose favour shall command more of my service: for sure is the unfeigned affection, in which I have devoted my self to your employment, that if there be a heaven in this world, I will seek that Paradise but in your kindness. Think not that I seek with eloquence to creep in your good opinion: for I had rather be, then seem to be, him that you seek: I shall be, for such bring your good thanks, of far more honour then the service of my affection, and trust not his truth, who hates the thought of dissimulation, and wisheth no greater happiness then in the honour of your commandment, for loving but you being favoured by you, I cannot be happy but in you. To court you with flattery is too common a folly, and to bribe your kindness with a consent of baseness; but to avow your service, let it be the duty of love, which from your heart to my eyes be a messenger of my true thoughts, who with all their might, to my uttermost power, have conjoined me with true service,

Yours only and wholly, H. W.

The Answer.

God bless, to adore your kindness with as ungracious, as to admit your service might be dangerous: and therefore not unthankful for your offer, give me leave to consider of the acceptance: A sudden passion holds not, and a first view may be deceitful; lead not then your heart to your eyes, to the hurt of your spirit, and seek not happiness in commandment, where liberty is so much contentment. Liking may be that of love, and liking may be mistaken in the true felicity: but if truth hath devoted your love, honour will be the reward of your service, which, if you shall prefer to one more worthy, you shall make your self the more happy. For my self I will think the best, till I find the contrary, but to move the worst, blame me not to be careful. A good beginning with a better proceeding, promitteth a blessed ending; which wishing you in all those courses, where truth is honourable in all her actions, having occasion of your employment, in a friendly title of command-

To a familiar friend

HAVING to fit a messenger, I could not let him pass without some remembrance of my love unto you; wherein if I may any ways pleasure you, I will be readier to perform it than speak it. Touching such things as you wrote unto me by the Carrier, I have taken care order for them; as I hope will be to your content; not a little glad that I had to God an opportunity to speak with the parties to con upon your Letter: I assure you I found them as tractable as you could wish. I have staid all causes till your coming to Town, when, I hope to bring all matters to a good end. I have sent you by this Bearer a Remembrance of Back, I hope not of the worst; howsoever it be; I wish it better than it is: I pray you take it in good part, and write me word how you like it, that I may either thank my Gintner, or change him. Needs here are none, but old or false; and therefore onely wishing you all happiness, with my hearty commendations to your self, and to your good Bedfellow, I commit you to the Almighty. London this 10 of April, 1653.

Your loving friend, W. W.

An Answer.

I HAVE received your kind Letter and friendly Token, for both which with many other good favours, I most heartily thank you: And for your care of my business, be you assured it shall not be forgotten. I will be at London if I can within this moneth, when you shall rule me in all things as you list. I am glad you have spoken with them, and hope by your good means to have peace after a long war. If it had not been for my Ague, I had been with you the last week; but as soon as I am sound I intend to see you: in the mean time in requital of your Back I have sent you a fat Doe; which if it prove like your Ham, I am sure it will pass with warrant: as it is, I commend it to your kindness, and my self to your commandment. And in hoping of your good health, which I pray for, as mine own, with thanks to your care for my Bandiny Chase, for which I have sent her a pound of Pepper that she wrote to me for, ready in what may lie in our power to pleasure either any one or both of you as one, I take my leave at this time, but rest all ways, Cambridge, April 1653.

A Letter of Love to a fair Mistres.

Sweet Lady, if the reach of my capacity could climb the hope of your favour, it should be a strange piece of service that I should refuse at your commandment: but when I think of your nobleness, and then behold mine own unworthiness, I can but swallow up those sighs, and dare speak nothing of my love. And yet when I know that the eyes of honour regard Vertue in no little grace, in the service of Honour I can fear no ill fortune: in the nature of which humbleness, throwing my heart into your hands, at the feet of your favour, laying the height of my hopes happiness, till occasion of imployment, and ever devoted to your commandment, I rest without rest, till I may ever only and wholly rest,

Yours in all I am, or not to be my self at all, D. G.

Her Answer.

SIR, I heard it of the wise, thus if Hope climb to Honour, Vertue is a good hold, whose service the most noble do most favourably entertain: in the nature of which humour if your affection be grounded, have no fear of Fortune, howsoever Envy be your enemy. Who speaks all in saying nothing, may understand an answer by the like reason, and think that hand unworthy honour, that will not kindly regard the heart of love. Leave then the sighs of fear to the faithless, and swallow not a Gudgeon in a dream; but as you find cause of honour, so perform either your love or service, which for god for an unworthy, reserve for your better fortune: and so in the best sort of kindness, ready to requite your good meaning, I rest in what I may,

Your assured friend, N. L.

Roger to Margery his Sweet-heart.

MArgery, I have received your snappish Letter, whereby I see you are more angry then I thought you would have been for a mis-word or two; but I hope to mend what is amiss, for I see I was to blame: for now I find the knavery of the world, I will look a little better to my self, for it was your Cousins doings to devise lies, to set you and me out; but if you will be ruled by me, we will mix with them well enough. Upon Friday I will meet you at the Parket, where we will have a Cake and a Pot at the Pickeril and the Spur: there we will strike up a bargain, that will not be broken in haste: and so forry wit, all my heart that I have done as I have done, sending the twenty kisses by my Sister Pamel, and this bowed Groat for a love-token, I rest, Yours from all the world, R. O.

Her Answer.

O Roger, the world is well amended: I thought you were misused to write to me as you did; but friends are nere so far out, but they may be as far in again: and therefore since it was against your will, I forgive you with all my heart; and let my Cousin do his worst, I will not go from my word. On Friday I will meet you at ten of the clock, and bring you a piece of Bacon in my pocket, to relish a cup of Ale; when it shall go hard, if all hit right, but some body shall wipe their nose for their knavery. And so Roger, hoping that you will no more abuse me as you have done, to believe lies and tales of me, till you know the truth, treating all unkindness under foot, I rest with all my heart, as I was and will be ever,

From a Yeoman in the Countrey to his Son in London.

Son, you know what charges I have been at with you, as well in bringing you up to London, as in furnishing you for your preferment; all which I hope you will have such a care of, that I shall not think any thing lost that I have done for you. In any wise serve God, please your Father, and be careful of such things as you are put in trust with: be rather an example of good then of evil, and have patience with all things, howsoever you are crossed in your expectation. Beware of evil company, and pride, and drunkenness: take heed of following fair women. I shall be glad to hear well of you, and as I see you thrive, you shall find me kind. Your Father is an honest man, and a good Trade is gainful: but I hope I need not be too earnest in advising thee for thy welfare. God who hath created thee, I hope will bless thee, that I shall have joy of thee: and for my self, with my blessing, I have sent thee here inclosed a token of my love, use it to thy god: shortly, God willing, thou shalt hear further from me; in the mean time and ever I rest,

Your loving Father, T. N.

An answer of the Son to his Father.

My good Father, I have received your kind Letter and Token, for which I humbly thank you: and for such things as you wish me to have have care of, be you assured I will not be unmindful of. For my Paster I thank God he putteth me in trust more then I will speak, and useth me so kindly, that I were a Jew if I should deceive him: but my Mistress is so perillous a woman, that if she be displeased, there is no quiet with her, but all the house may learn patience of my Paster; and therefore I will fad her humour, and let her have her saying. For women, when I mean to wive I will take choice; and for evil company, I hope God will blest me out of such as are not for my god: and therefore fear not, I hope one day to give you cause to think all well bestowed that you have or will lay out for me. I have sent you by this bearer a Watking bag, my Pother a pair of Globes, and my Sister a Circle. My Paster hath him heartily commended to you, and to my Pother, and desires you to send him a good Cheese, which he will requite: he hath sent my Pother a pound of Sugar, and giveth her thanks for her fine puddings. This is all that at this time I have to write unto you; and therefore beseeching your blessing, praying to God for your health and long life, with my humble duty to you, and my good Pother, and commendations to all my friends, I commit you to the Almighty,

London.

To a Wife in the Countrey.

Good Wife, in all kindness I commend thee to thy self, assuring thee that I think it long till I have dispatched my business, and am at home again; but I hope of good success in my sute: For my Countel doth warrant my case clear. Upon Friday next I shall have trial, which I doubt not will go on my side; if it do not, my thought is taken: For I thank God I can live without it, though I would be loth to lose it. My health I thank God I have well, and pray for the same to thee and thine. I pray you send me up Twenty pounds by this Bearer with all speed, and within five days after the dispatch of my business, expect my coming down: In the mean time kiss my little Babes for me, to whom with thy self, I send my hearts hoping commendations, and so in haste I commit thee to the Almighty,

London.

Your very loving Husband, R. T.

Her Answer.

Sweet-heart, your Messengers hast makes me briefer, then otherwise I would be: The good dispatch of your business I hope, and heartily pray for; your health I am glad of, and your return cannot be so soon, as wished for. Your money I have sent by this Bearer: your little ones with my self would be glad to see you, who do not a little miss you, for divers causes too tedious at this time to trouble you withal: But in any wise remember the Girls Calve. God Husband make one end of other with it this Term, lest delays and demurs make you to spend in it more then it is worth: But you know what to do better then I can advise you; therefore leaving it to your discretion to do what shall best please you, I commit you to God, and rest in haste,

A Letter upon ordinary causes.

SIR, it is given me to understand by some that lately came from those parts, that from the Islands there have arrived of late certain men, that by a cross wind and sudden tempest, are driven into your Harbours: if it be true, and that they lie there for any time, I pray you fail me not to buy me a hundred of Ling, as much Haberdine, and other stuff, such as you think good: I would lay out a hundred pounds willingly; what you lay out, you shall upon your Letter have paid here in London, to whom you shall direct it. I have sent down by the Carrier a piece of broad Cloth, the same colour whereof you wrote unto me; I am assured it will be to your liking: if you need any more, or any thing else that may lie in my power, I pray you make as bold of me as any friend you have. God-fish or no? John I have no need of, and therefore hoping that you will husband my purse as a friend, with my hearty commendations I commit you to the Almighty. London this 8. of May, 1653.

Your loving friend, M. R.

The Answer.

SIR, your Letter and piece of Cloth I have received, for which I heartily thank you: for which you shall receive money by my Cousin at Dice-key, when it please you to send to him: but for the Fisher-men, indeed they put in for a night, but in the morning the wind came fair, and they put to Sea again: so that except a few Ling that they bestowed upon our Vayor and Bayliffs, for some fresh Victual that they had from us, there was little bought here at this time: but we hear of them that shortly we shall have a Fleet come by us; when, if there be any good to be

be done, I will not fail to befriend you to your content: in the mean time wishing any good occasion wherein I might requite your kindness, in prayer for your health, and hearts ease, I commit you to God.

A Letter to a friend for the dispatch of business.

I Am bold to intreat your kindness, to stead me in what you may touching the purchase of the Mills and Hop-Gardens; for which if your neighbour will take mine offer, I am for him, or else I must otherwise determine of my money, that I have reserved only for that use. I am offered great penny-worths in divers places; but the air pleaseth me well about that house, and the Tounts in the little Woods have made me have a great mind to dwell thereabouts: if therefore you can bring him to my price, I will be beholding to you; if not, let me know his mind, and I am satisfied: for to tell you the truth I would have it, though it cost me more then it is worth. And so intreating you to do me what good you can herein, for which you shall not find me unthankful, I rest,

Your loving friend, J. W.

The Answer.

I Received your Letter, dated the xiii. of this moneth, whereby I understand your mind touching the Lease of the two Mills and Hop-Gardens, but I cannot bring it to pass one penny under the sum; whereupon he tells me you were in a manner agreed: the man is hard but very honest, and the Land good, and lieth finely to the house; the Soil is healthful, and there is good store of Springs: besides, the River is not far off, whereby you may have carriage weekly from the City upon a small reckoning: but use your discretion, the price you know, and me you may command; but time would not be deferred, for there are many about it: and therefore leaving to your discretion either to take it, or refuse it, with assurance of my help to the utmost of my power, either in this, or what else may pleasure you, I always rest, Yours as you know, T. D.

A Letter of Love betwixt Rinaldo and Lorina.

Fairest of the world, and sweetest of the earth, the beauty of whose eyes puts the best wits to admiration; and the wisdom of whose government commands the honoz of loves service: How should my amazed spirit

Spirit hope of power to presume near the happiness of your favour? No, Fortune is my ever sworn enemy, and desert must take place in a higher reach, than the longest arm of my unworthiness: yet let me not be so deprived of Reason, that I may not look into the nature of Vertue, where honour in kindness makes beauty Angelical; but in the humility of affection to offer the employment of my service; in which if I fail the expectation of your affection, upon the commendation of insufficiency, let disgrace be my deadly punishment; where, in the labyrinth of sorrow I may languish all my days: but if the Fates be not too forward in crossing the endeavours of my duty, be you gracious unto love, that hath so loyally sworn me your servant; with which title if I may be honoured, I will seek no other colours of my comfort. But fearing your unknown occasion of affairs, I will not be tedious to your patience, but rest ever in my love,

Your avowed, though not allowed servant, Rinaldo.

Wittiest of a hundred, and craftiest of a thousand, whose eloquence like enchantment, would take prisoner a weak imagination: How should my simple capacity conceive the drift of your advice? Fortune is but a fiction, and therefore it is no matter for her friendship, while desert hath power in the preferment of duty, and love in vertue gives an honour to beauty; where if Reason be careful, Affection may be joyful: But leave Angels to the Heaven, and take heed of Devils upon Earth, which under the cloke of humility, hide the head of ambition. Perfection hath no affinity with corruption; and what the Heavens determine, the world must endure. But in flattery of my perfection, you have deceived my expectation; who imagining you wise, am sorry to see the contrary: And if I might be judge, the Law would quickly have his course; where dissimulation appearing, should be condemned to perpetual disdain: but hoping better of your humour, then to wrong the simplicity of belief, let the patience of affection lead you out of the labyrinth of sorrow, to the mountain of that bliss, whose vertue may give you grace; to the attainment whereof, leaving your thoughts to their best issue, I rest as I may,

Your friend, Lorina.

A Reply.

The high honour of your vertue, that from the merit of your graces flyeth through the world so far beyond Fame, as makes her amazed

zed of her wonder, so dampeth the power of my spirit, that as an eye which is beholding the Sun, twinketh with the lids for fear to lose the sight; so the humble eye of my heart, that in beholding the bright beams of your Sunny beauty, trembling in fear for presumption to lose the life of loves hope, submitteth it self to the will of that power, which in pitty may save, or in fury may kill the life of that creature, who at the feet of your favour hath laid the height of his felicity. Shew therefore the heavenly nature of that vertue, which may purchase you worthy honour. Take not pleasure in destruction, that may be gracious in comfort; but lead the heart by your eye, that hateth the light, but in your love; where in the glass of clearest grace, truth may see her beauty unspotted: and honour in truths service craves but the entertainment of employment: in which time shall conform, that care shall ever conclude. My thoughts shall be onely honoured in your service, and my love ever happy in your commandment: in hope whereof if I may I will rest,

Yours ever, Rinaldo.

Her Answer.

The low course in loves comfort that you take, to lead you into my liking, is too far from the nature of good desert; that I know not whether silence were a fit answer to idleness, or reprehension a just reward for indiscretion: and therefore in doubt what to do, pardon me, if I do not as I should; for although wisdom would admit no cause of danger, yet countesse is such a law in nature, as is too great a friend to love. Yet if I could chide and not be angry, I could wish you leave a creeping climbing, lest you be thought a baser creature, then may stand with the honour of your condition. Leave a twinkling eye to Divil sights, and figure not the Sun in the cypher of a shadow: nor presume farther then you may pass without fear; but in submission use that discretion, that may maintain the reputation of affection; and be persuaded that vertue cannot be ungracious, howsoever folly run upon destruction. Farther is hateful to nature, and love is the top of reason: what then should trouble a good spirit, that is possessed of no ill humour, but in the resolution of honour to build the hope of his happiness, and while colours are fittest for Painters, to march under the Ensign of Truth; where in the field of Fame, Vertue carrieth the victory: to the trial of which service, leaving the happy event of your adventures, I rest as I may,

Your poor friend, assured, Lorina.

A familiar Letter to a friend in the Countrey.

How near ingratitude is to forgetfulness, I would be loth my silence should make proof, especially knowing the kind welcome of my unworthy Letters: and therefore understand you, that all things are here as you left them, health nothing impaired, and our substance (if we may so term our drossy treasure) little diminished; but our minds, through want of your company, not so merry as when you were with us: For the fusty spirits of unseasoned wits, who understand no other wealth than their own will, make time tedious; which were it better exercised, would be more pleasing: and so to tell you truth, were not Books my better friends, I should be subject to much melancholy. But my Library, though but little, stands me in much good stead; in which if there be any Book that may pleasure you, I pray you make use of it: and so soon as you well may, let me intreat you return, and till then your often writing, that we may joy in your health; which as I hope of, I daily pray for. News here are many, but so few true, or of any worth, that being as yet altogether uncertain what to believe, till I have further certain intelligence, I will crave pardon at this time, and rest always,

Your assured friend, M. T.

His Answer.

In reading your Letter, then which nothing but your self can be more welcome, methinks I see the meeting of two Lovers in a morning, who surely dreaming of each other in their sleep, scarce well awake, came out with a kind of wonder. Oh Lord, how have you done since yesterday night; so may I say to you. It is not a full week since we were together, and shall we fear silence for so little a while? But what shall I say? It is a pleasing humour to solicit love, and content to the mind to continue quietness; which fortune crossing in want of presence, wit can work in spite of absence: let then the muddy Fish dwell in miry Lakes, and the better natures seek sweeter places. And for thy Library, I will not make thee jealous of my love; but let me tell thee they are most sweet companions, and so for their own sakes esteem them: and though I love them, yet I will not deprive thee of any of them; for to an understanding spirit, they are a kind of Paradise. Now for my health, I thank God I need no Physick, and for my purse, it hath vent enough for setting my money grow rusty; and for my mind, to tell you the truth, it is with God and thee, with whom I hope to be shortly; till when, and then, and ever I rest,

Yours, what mine own, N. B.

A Letter from a Father to his Son at the University.

My dear Son, as nothing can joy the heart of a Father more than the obedience of a loving Child, so can there be nothing more grievous than a stubborn spirit of an ungracious Son. I speak this to thee, knowing thy peace and understanding able to digest the consideration of my desire; which in sum is my joy in thy god. For let me tell thee, my estate thou knowest, and how much I have strained my credit for thy advancement; to which learning being a speedy and assured good means, I would be glad to see my comfort in thy profit in such fruits of thy study, as with the blessing of God may hasten thy preferment. I am loath to tell thee, that I bear thee diligence doth not answer my desire, and I would gladly wish it otherwise; but I hope a kind admonition will suffice to work a good nature, and therefore will rather hope the best then doubt the contrary: and in the love of a Father, let me intreat thee to avoid the company of a lewd fellow, as rather an enemy then a friend. The feminine Sex are dangerous to effect; for as they will be a loss of time, so with hindrance of study they will produce expence. The exercise of the body I admit for thy health, but let thy love be in thy learning, else wilt thou never be a good Scholar; for Dextre and Delight are the best Powers both of Art and Knowledge, while Reason vertuous makes understanding gracious. And therefore not out of the bitter humour of displeasure, but the careful nature of affection, I write unto thee for thine own good; and so praying to God for thee, whom I beseech daily to bless thee, with my hearts love to the Lords blessing I leave thee,

Your loving Father, H. N.

An Answer of the Son to the Father.

After the bands of humble duty, my good Father, I have received your most kind and loving Letter, in which how much joy I have received, I cannot express, fearing rather your sharp rebuke, then loving admonition; but God himself, who can, doth work more in some natures with a kind chiding, then in some other with many stripes. I know you are not ignorant of the inclination of youth, and therefore do thus kindly touch the hurt of unheedfulness; for which how much I do humbly thank you, I hope my care of your counsel in time shall pleasingly tell you: therefore for what ill you have heard, grieve not; and of the good you may hear, doubt not: and believe me, for I will not abuse your trust; what vanity soever I have seemed to effect, my Weakness hath been the Mistress of my love, in which how much I will labour, and from which what profit I will gather, your hope shall see in the effect of Gods blessing; without the which, how dangerous are others studies to the understanding of ungracious spirits, I would it were not known in any, and I pray God that none may know it in me. My preferment I leave to Gods pleasure, who best know how to dispose of his servants; and so; your contentment that it may be in my obedience. Your health as the worlds happiness, I pray so; mine own moderate exercise, with abstinence from excess, both with Gods blessing hold me in good state: and so; the feminine sex, though I would be no hypocrite, yet I had rather read of them, then be acquainted with them; so; I allow of your opinion touching them: and so hoping that ere long you shall receive as much content of my courses, as you have ever doubted the contrary, in the duty of my humble love I take my leave for this time, but rest always,

Your devout Son, W. N.

To his dear and only beloved Miltress, Susan Pearl.

Sweetest of my thoughts, and nearest of my love, if Reason had the power to express the nature of the passion, I am persuaded that the eye of thy beauty would purchase a kind look upon the heart of my love, which continually languishing in the doubt of my affection, desireth not to live but in comfort of thy kindness. Loth I am with ceremonious eloquence to move suspicion of truth, and yet an Orient Pearl would be set in pure gold. Gods speeches fit not fine spirits; and for your self, I will rather honour then flatter you: and if I may serve you, I will so well deserve of you, that I will lay the hope of my worlds happiness upon the honor of your favour. Setting aside all care of other contentment, I have bequeathed my life to your love: in which, if I fail in the truth of your trust, let me receive the reward of your disgrace, which is more direful then death can be. Let me but intreat your admission of my service, belief of my love, and regard of my trial; which be it in body or in mind, shall have no rest, but in your pleasure. What shall I say, but time is precious, and delayed patience in passion is most grievous. Hasten therefore, I beseech you, the hope of my desire in the happiness of your commandment, and let no cloud of mistrust bar me the light of your love, which being on the earth the onely bright Star that leads me to the worlds heaven, let me live as in death, till I may revive in this comfort: in hope whereof, and desire of which, laying the helm of my fortune at the feet of your honor, I rest with little rest, till I may fully and wholly rest,

Yours and all, or mine own nothing at all, T. L.

To the Reader.

Reader, I know not what you are, and therefore I cannot well tell what to say; onely this at adventure: If you be wise you will not play the Fool, in scoffing at that which perhaps may deserve a better countenance; if you be not wise, I can but pray for your better understanding: howsoever you be, I will hope the best of you, that you will think of my work as it deserves, which is as much as I desire. If you get any good by it, thank me for it; if hurt, thank your self for your abuse of that might serve you better. This is all I can and will at this time say unto you: my intent was to pleasure many, and you may be one of them; and to hurt none at all, therefore not you. So leaving my Book to your liking; as it falleth out, I rest, as I have reason,

Your friend,

A P O S T

With a Packet of mad Letters.

A Letter between the Knight R. M. And

Fair Lady,

Sweet should be that spirit, which through the instinct of love understandeth the silence of truth, whose tongue is the heart, whose words are sighes, in which are hidden the secret fruit of whole Trees, that onely grow in Paradise of Reason: Touchtate then, faire eye, more bright then the Sun-beams, with one insolent glance of your Graces labour, to bless this rude and unworthy Paper, the which if it hath made you any way offended, in the fire consume it; but if through the power of the Fates, or the effect of your kindnes, it may do you the least pleasure, let him be metamorphosed to worse then nothing, that would be any thing but that Letter, during your reading, or ever any other thing, then at your pleasure in your service; for that under heaven, having no course of comfort, but in my thought, that shall seek sweetness in other sense: No looking for no felicity, but in the nest of the Phoenix, which is in the admiration of honour, in humility of Love I rest,

Her Answer.

Villaine might well appear in that heart, which could pierce into the conceit of that spirit, that with the figures of love, deceives the sense of simplicity; which not suspecting evil, fears seldom other substance. Oh poor Truth, how is thy title made a shadow of deceit; while in seeking of Paradise, folly falls into Hell: Yet not to wrong any creature, happy may he live that makes faith his felicity, and pardoned by that Paper that does but his Masters messenger.

Age, then let us be wised in the death of forgetfulness, while silence understandeth that vertue speaks: and in the fire of that flame, whose heat is more felt and seen, be that letter burned that offends me with pleasure. So assuring my self, that if from the nest of the Phoenix you pass without a feather, either the figure will be a cypher, or the fancy affection: so leaving your thoughts to a blessed issue, I rest, affectionately,

Yours in what I may, E. R.

His Reply.

Unworthy should that heart be of the least of loves happiness, that can have power to give place to the popson of deceit: and more then miserable were the life, that to Hell makes such a passage. Oh blessed Creature, do not think the World to be the Cave of the accursed, nor do a wrong to love, in the suspicion of truth. Simple Faith hath no fear, and true love cannot fail; but if Silence be the onely answer of expectation of comfort, hope in obscureness must see the happiness of desire: but let not fancy be a cypher, when faith knows no action; but let your favour be the Feather in the nest of my devouring Phoenix; which till I may kindly receive, I shall in the Sun-beams of your vertue consume to the ashes of discomfirt: in which, commending the sum of my life to the true and honourable service of love, I rest,

Yours what in me own, R. M.

Th: Answer.

Ungracious is that spirit, that through suspicion of Deceit, both injury to love; and blessed is the fancy, that loves only by faith: Sweet is the war, where kindness ends the quarrel; and little the hurt, where hope is a most present and ready help: In brief, they are blind travellers, that in seeking to find Heaven, go to Hell; and if Love be himself, he hath life in assurance: let it then suffice you to find the one of Desert, where Desire exceeds not limits of Reason; so in the nature of that honour, that gives heretofore her best grace, commending the comfort of your care to the condition of your conceit, I rest as I have occasion to equal honour in true affection,

Yours as I find cause, E. R.

A merry Letter from a conceited friend to his like familiar.

Honesty, I hope I am in the right, except the great Wind have blown clean away your best wit. Give me leave, spight of your teeth, to tell you that I love you, and lest I should grow deaf, I would be glad to hear of you: and therefore having a fit messenger, I thought it not amiss to write; not for any thing I have to say, but that while I think of you, you shall see I will not forget you: For though complements are but idle, yet they make words instead of other matter. Now to the purpose you shall understand, that at the writing hereof, a sudden occasion of business made me make an end ere I begun; and therefore intending to write I know not what, to abide my conceit I know not how: but hoping that you are wise enough to think what you list, I will only pray for you, that being in as good health as I left you, as soon as conveniently you can, I may meet with you when and where it shall please you: for as you know, I am for you in all kindness to quit you, and so to him that made you, ever to bless and keep you, with my hearty commendation I leave you,

Yours what mine own, N. B.

An Answer to the same.

Merry Gigge, I am sure I am not in the wrong, except the Suns radiant beams have dried up your brains since I left you: let me, for I will tell you, and in my love I out-leaped you, and will not be idle as not to answer you, that my senses do not so fail me, but that I understand you; and having no better company, would be glad to be troubled with you: for you have not a kind thought wherein I do not quarrel with you, whether is of more force in the nature of true friendship; which because Fortune favours few fools this year, we must tarry longer to play our game, but never too late to go to an ill bargain: For now we talk our Purles take no hurt, but when the Term comes, that we may joyn issue in our Cause, I fear the Kings-head in Fish-street will find us two good Clients. But all is well that ends well, except it were bad in the beginning, as I think by this my Letter: for being troubled with Me not tell you what, lest it should make you think I care not what, I have written what you may read; and do as you see cause, either to reply with imperfection, or let it rest with a Non-plus: and so no.

doubting you to be your self, and to put me in the number of your self,
I rest to your self and my self,

One always yours, H. W.

A reply to the last Letter, with some news.

I If you were as wise as I could wish you, I could take a little pains to write into you; and yet for that you understand your self, I care not if I trouble you with a little idleness. In the Parish of Saint As, at the sign of the Hobby-Horse, Paid Parrian and the Fool fell together by the ears with the Piper; so that had not the good man of the Pewter-Candlestick set in for the Morris-dance; the May-game had been quite spoiled. But when the game had gone round, and their brains were well warmed, their legs grew so nimble, that their heels went higher then their heads. But in this cold sweat, while lusty guts and his best beloved were casting Shaps eyes at a Cods head, Hue and Cry came suddenly through the street, The Fox hath killed a tame Goose; at the sudden noise whereof the multitude were so scared, that all the Morris-dancers were divided, and the Fool ran home to poor town; but because we have some miss of him in our Parish, I pray you keep him not too long with you. And so for lack of better present occurrents, content your self with such news as the times affords you; hereafter you may have better: till when, and always I rest as you know,

Yours, N. B.

An Answer to the News.

I If you were not more then half mad, you would not have danced such a Trenchmore with your little wits; but yet since I grieve it is about the full of the Moon, I will hope shortly of your amendment: In the mean time let me advise you to take patience to your understanding, to direct you in a better course: for when you awaked out of your dream, you saw no body but the man that you thought was run to our Town, and he was putting you on a Coat with four Elbows. For Paid Parrian, the, I think is troubled with you in her Cream-pot: but for the Hobby-horse, alas, he hath forgot your turn, and therefore you shall do well to make repair to our market; I think it will be a Saints day: when if a naughty Bird do not cross the Nightingale, you shall hear some strange musick about your Meadow-plot, and at the least you shall hear the old Song that you were wont to like well of, sung by the black browes with the cherry-cheek under the side of the pig;

pine Cole; Come like with me and be my love: You know the rest, and I'll rest,
 Thine what mine own, H. W.

Another Reply.

O Brave Oliver, leave me not behind you: you play the Merchant all the week, and make all whole upon the Holy-day; you would be angry if you could tell how: and yet having the Cards in your hand, you cannot choose but turn up the Ruddy: The matter is not great. That Taylor that sitteth in my Coat, hath made you many a Jacket; where if it were not for displeasing Jack-an-Apes, I could make him fall out with the Workman, for acquainting you with his invention. But let this pass, and to a better purpose: my neighbour and your god friend hath a welcome in store for you; and his eldest daughter would make you both a Husband and a Brother: her worth you know, and his wealth will do no hurt. I should be glad of your god fortune, and you I think should play well at, be you pleased; and so much for the conjunction. As for News I hear none of late, but that the Bayliff of our Hundred hath had a mischance: his Wife taking a blow that never smarted, he hath a pain in his head that cannot be cured: for having no other blaster then patience, is resolved to make good cheer with his friends; finding himself alone, is content to make merry with god fellows. This is all for this time, and so in haste I end,

Yours, N. B.

An Answer.

When suit goes a wool-gathering, the thread of it may be fine, if it be well spun. I see you have little to do, that have so much leisure to play your Lark-pups. If I could meet you right, I would fit you a penny worth; but though I cannot pay you your due, I will not die in your debts; and though I play at Ruddy, I will not take the Card out of your hand; for I know not how you can spare him. But leaving Cassidore to their tricks, and Jack-an-Apes to his Ponkey, let me tell you; that for your neighbour you are so near him, that I need not to trouble him; and for his wealth and her worth, you know well enough what to do with them. For my self, I love not to shake hands with your Constable in the Company of kind fellowship; but yet not forgetting an honest earnestness, I would wish her better fortune than my attention: and so commending my self, I will assist thee with my god prayers, that the Baptist of the Hundred may find the one among a thousand; I mean, to shake hands, but not heads with: and so in some little occasion of sudden business, I will here conclude for this time, and always rest, Thine, H. W.

To my honourable good Lord, my Lord

Morast.

Right honourable, to express unto your god Lordship the humble duty of my affection, I cannot better do it, then by this Bearer; whom for many good parts, sitting your Honours pleasure, I can well commend to your favourable entertainment. For as god Masters are like black Swans, so such Servants are choice creatures; for a little matter of small moment will hoist up folly above the Clouds, while Wisdome runs a course of a more careful temper; such I hope shall you find your Servant, whose Wit and Conscience take such counsel in his Actions, that the judgement of god experience hold him worthy god account. For my self, lest I should be partial, I will leave his praise to your proof; and in hope of your contentment, onely intreat your entertainment. Shortly I hope to see you still, when persuaded that his service shall gain him more praise then my pen; I will leave his qualities to your trial, and his service to your favour; and so in unfrangible love rest during life,

Your assured friend in true affection, R. B.

To my loving Cousin T. W. Justice of Peace.

Worthy Sir, I would be glad to write you News of the dispatch of your business, but yet it will not be; for Lawyers being full of Clients, cannot answer all men at once: and therefore considering your matter is a case of more conscience then gain, I must attend the leisure of your Counsellor; who as he is wise, I doubt not but will prove honest, and then a little time will be well born with that brings a good hour at the last. Your Adversary is full of money, and trudging up and down like a For; but I hope instead of a Gale he will be choked with a Sea-ther. Have you no fear or care of it, for I doubt not but to effect it to your content: and so much for your law business. Now for other matters, the occurrences of time are either so frivolous, or dangerous, that I think silence better blamed then babled: for though there be few Partridges, yet there be many Setters here in this Town, who listen for speech, intercept letters, accuse the simple, and undo the foolish; and therefore I had rather be be silent with the Nightingale till May, then prate like a Cuckoo out of season. Yet for that you shall not think me fearful of Sparrow-blasting, I will write you a little News. Tobacco is like to grow a great commodity; for there is not an Officer or a Tapster, but will be at his whistle or two, and using as a blowing-horn to draw on a pot of Beer. Bottle Ale is more common then good, and yet dear enough, it is so taken up with the drunken Crew. Thieves were well waxed, and yet beside those great Thievers, there are some lookers now and then. Painting was never so common, and pretty cheap. And for women, some go like Anticks, some like Maskers, some proudly sober, and some like careless resolution, but some few like Angels; but they are too high for men, and therefore I will leave them to higher powers. Now men are as in time past; if young, hardly wise, though witty; if aged, wise; if wealthy, served and honoured; if poor, at least scorned, if not worse used; if wise, perhaps implored; if foolish, baffled: this I say for the most part; for some time, for some cause, both youth and age, and poverty, and folly finely born withal; but for that, this is rather an old observation, then any new matter, I will end my long Letter with never ending love; and so in hope of your health, commit you to the Almighty.

Your very loving Cousin, W. R.

To the right honourable his good Lord, the Lord W. H.

Right honourable, your Nobleness never ceased to bind my service to your kindness, which hath made me at this instant to presume a little upon your good favour: So it is, my good Lord, that I am shortly to bestow a Daughter of mine in marriage upon a Gentleman of some worth. and according to our custome friends must be feasted, when a Party of Menison is a grace to the whole service. Your Honour shall much pleasure me, and as often heretofore, give me no little cause to be thankful. My state is not great, but my love so far assured, as wherein I may deserve that I cannot requite, I will fail of my hope, but I will discharge some part of my debt: and so not doubting your favour to this my suit for a Buck, beseeching God to add happiness to your good health, I humbly take my leave,

Your Honours in all humbleness, R. S.

To his dear friend, Master F. R. at his Lodging in the Temple.

My noble Friend, you wrote of late to me for my opinion of your intent, and advice for your course: which two points, I will touch as truly and as fitly as I can. Your intent is to leave your Study, and first to Court, and then to Armes: But what hath altered your intent in Study, to fall upon an intent to strange courses? For your Books peaceably intreat of those things, which you may not find disquiet in passing through. For touching your first course, is it not better to read of Princes, then to carry their Crowns? You cannot feel their burthens, except you have their cares, how full of perils are their pleasures? Yea, how many instruments of mischief hath the Devil sent into the World, to cross the courses of good Princes, that are leading their people to Heaven; and if they be unwilling to their own Flocks, how safe is it to be far from their Court? Now leaving good Princes to Gods blessing, and others to his amendment, go a little to his Counsel. Oh how great are the weight of their charges, and how many the natures of their troubles; who if they all be of one mind, and as it were one body of many members, yet some time a Toe, or a Finger, a Hand, or an Arm, a Tooth, or an Eye, a Tongue, or an Ear, may perhaps be out of temper, and so that all the body may be out of frame. Say their wits are great through experience of place, and their powers great in the vertue of labour; yet withal, when experience is put to a new study, providence must try the power of wit with no little trouble: and when power rests upon labour, what is the fear of fortune? And further, Is not the care of a Commonwealth a continual toil of wit, Power a dangerous step to Pride, hateful in the highest eye, and fortune unfaithfull in all her favours? Rather read thou the laudable carriage of their courses in the Service of Kings, then seek in Court to have their Kingly Courses: For God onely knoweth their Consciences, themselves onely the Care, and thou canst not know their Crosses. But leaving them at their honourable proceedings, go a little lower to the Ladies; and what shall thou see? Either a Creature like an Angel, if vertuous, or worse then a Woman, if vicious. Perhaps thou shalt see painting spoil a good Complexion, or deceive a simple eye-sight. Hear, out of a fine presence, a fond Spirit speak idle; and perhaps an idle wit play the Wanton. Now what art thou benefited by all this? Abuse thine eye with Picture, offend thine ear by Folly, or lose thy time in idleness. Were it not better for thee to read the fiction of Venus, then to be a servant servant to Vanitie; and to laugh at Fancy, then to follow Folly; Pray say there be a Phoenix among Birds, if her nest be high, take heed of climbing for fear of a fall, take heed of the Object that makes an Abiect of a Subject. But look aside at the attendants, what shall you see? Cost and Courtisie, long service, painful duty, hope of favour, with fear of displeasure; a great Harbess, many Labourers, and few Gainers; and it must be so: for desires are many, but deserts few; and therefore they have little. In sum, a Prince thou canst never be, a Councello; never think to be. Ladies are lovely, but beauty is costly; and the charge of attendants may bring hope to assurance. In my opinion therefore thy intent is not good, and thy proceeding will be worse in thy humour of Courting. Now for Arms, is it not better to read of Noble Acts of Conquering, then to try the misery of the Conquered; and to suffice Nature with a little, then to starve for want of food? Oh the danger of death, the doubt of victories, the cross of valor, the terror of sacking a City, the defence of a battell, the sight of blood, the cares of the sorrowful, and the consideration of conscience: Oh these, with many other ill banquets, bitter storms, deadly wounds, cold lodgings, hard fare, stinking drink, and lowly rags, and who knows how long? These things I say, with what else I say not, are sufficient I hope, to dissuade thee from such a desperate course. Rather read of true valor, and upon good cause and fit time adventure life for honour, for thy Countrey, thy Religion, or thy life; otherwise under the shew of sacking honour, go not like an hired Butcher to kill Beasts, like a Tyrant to kill men for money. Remember what thou hast read, Blessed are the Peace-makers: seek peace and ensue it; for God will bless it if he make it. Yet if needs thou wilt go to the field, begin not with the Court, lest dainty fare, ease, and idleness, make thee unfit to adventure the hard course of honour: but that in regard of the great travels, and perils in those passages, the titles of honour do most truly belong to those well-deservers; while valour shewn in mercy, doth grace nobleness in goodness: yet for that I think thy Body not answerable to thy Spirit, out of my love I have written thee my advice, hoping that it will take effect, though not as I wish, yet such as may be to thy good. And so knowing thy judgement sufficient to determine of thy best course, I leave thee with it to the direction of the Almighty, whom I beseech even so to bless thee, that I may always hear well of thee, and rejoice to see thee. From my Lodging in the little Colledge this tenth of May, 1653.

Thine more then spoken, N. B.

A Letter from a Batchelor to a rich Widow.

W Know, if you would be so woe, I would call you sweet: for though you know I love you, yet you will say I flatter you: but yet be it how it will, this is truth; believe it as you will, your eyes have caught my heart, who hath sworne me a servant to your will. I cannot with eloquence court you, but I can truly love you, and think my self blessed if I might enjoy you: for as your presence may please the wisest, so your wisdom may command the honest. For your wealth be it more or less then is reported, your self being of more worth then you can have wealth, I wish your self rather then what is yours. You fear perhaps youths unconstancy; it is true that probeth truth: and for my love it shall end with my life. But what are wozas unbelieved, or hopes not firmly grounded, like the vision of a dream which awakes, proves nothing: yet good Widow, if you be kind, pity me, and if pitiful, favour me; and if gracious, love me: God will regard you, love will be true to you, and I will die ere I will deceive you. You may increase your coyn, and decrease your comfort, when a coughing long at midnight may make you sleep before day; but venture a little and have much. What I am, or have, you shall have all; my love, my service, my life; and what can you have more; a little more drink to make the cup run over, and perhaps mar the drink that was good before; a little more coyn to fill the other bag, and perhaps fall out to be a piece of false money. When commanded by a Costrel, that will serve for nothing but a Cuckold, or curbed by a Cub, that will grate you to the bones for an old Goat, you will curse your treasure that was the cause of your destruction: No, no, be good to thy self, in being kind to me; hear me, believe me, love me, and take me; for I will be a servant to thy will, a companion to thy kindness, and a steward to thy substance. This as I live, and hope of thy love thou shalt find; for my heart hath avowed it, and I will not be a villain to my own soul: in which, praying for thy health, and to be made happy in thy kindness, to say amen to my prayers, I rest, Thine avowed howsoever regarded, T. M.

A Letter of advice to his Friend, W. C.

Honest Will, I hear by your Mother, that you are going to the University; where no doubt, but with good care and diligence, you may do your self much good. But before that I have passed the Place that you are going to, and have tried the natures of those Studies, and the profit to be made of them, let me tell thee mine opinion on of them, and which I think best for thee to follow for thy good-first, for the better blessing of whatsoever thou follow, bestow some labour in reading the Divine Law; That done, note what I tell thee for the increase of thy Stock, when thou shalt come to have any Dealings in the World. For thy better instructions in such courses as may be for thy Commodity, observe these Rules that I shall read thee: First, for Grammar, it is every Master of petty Schools common Fall; Logick is but for the University: For Musick it brings more Crotchets then Croons; for Astronomy, it goes too high above the Clouds to do any good on the Earth; Cosmography is good for a Traveller, and Astrology for a Seaman: but for him that means to gather wealth, and grow rich, let him be perfect in Arithmetick, to be sure of his Numbers; it will be a means to grow rich many ways: For if you keep a Per-chants Book, you shall learn his Accounts, the price of his Wares, and the gains of them, as well by great, as by retail, as well outward, as homeward; and this is a sure way to wealth. Again, if you be advanced to a place of Office, to keep account of the number of the people, the Duties, Tributes, and what payment soever to be made by them, for Subsidies, Fittens, Customs, and what else soever, Arithmetick is most necessary for the speedy dispatch of all such businesses: For howsoever honour may be sought or bought by them that have enough, seek thou wealth, and that will bring thee what the world can give thee. For if thou fall into want, and impairing or spending thy stock, be forced to take some mean course for thy maine chance.

 I will tell thee what thou shalt find true; The honest will only pity thee, and say, That thou mayest keep a School, it is an honest Trade, when a Churl will grudge at his Groat for a Shillings worth of labour, in beating quick sense into a dull wit; who, if he be not capable of a good understanding, yet shall the fault of his imperfection be imputed to thy negligence, and thou undeservedly receive a frown or a foul word for thy labour. Now the proud Peacock that hath a little more money then wit, will perhaps entertain thee to a blew Coat, and forty Shillings, which how grievous it will be to a good Spirit, thou shalt find, and I shall be loath to hear. Believe me, if thou have the Sciences, be furnished with many Languages, and art acquainted with honourable Courses, and a Heart as honest as can live; yet if thou lack wealth to grace all the rest, thou shalt have a Fool come over thee, and a Knave abuse thee: And he whose wit goes no further then his Trade, so play upon thy misery with scanning the course of life, that thou wilt wish rather never to be born, then to be born down with unhappiness; yea, for necessities sake thou shalt be forced to bestow thy study in fictions and fallacies.

and to spend thy spirits in vain; yea, I may say vile intentions, to commend an unworthy person, to the wound of thine own conscience; who though he love to hear himself flattered, yet perhaps when he hath miserably regarded thee, yet he will lye of his bounty, which is little better then beggary. O what a plague is it to a noble spirit, through inward want to present an Arts with a burthen of wit, or a base spirit with a train of Honour. O dear Will, the wealthy, that hath but a little wit, will grow rich with making benefit of thy labours, while thou not weighing the lack of judgement in the first directing of thy course, wilt pine away with sorrow, to think of thy mistaken Fortune. In brief therefore follow my counsel, study all the Arts superficially, but chiefly Arithmetick; for it is the assured way to wealth. Be not ignorant in Divinity, for it is the souls comfort; and take heed of Poetrey, lest it run away with thy wit: for it hath commonly one of these three properties; believing the wicked, abusing the honest, and pleasing the foolish: and therefore though some excellent man may have some excellent humour, do thou rather read in an Evening, then make thy days work in the study of idleness. Give them praise that deserve it, but do not thou bend thy delight towards it; for in a word, it is more full of pleasure then profit. Thus have I writ thee a tedious Letter, hoping that if thou wilt follow my advice, it will do thee no harm; and if so much good as I desire, I shall be glad to see it: In the mean time, leaving thy courses with thy self, to the guiding and tuition of the Almighty, I rest, Thine in much affection, R. P.

To his most honourable Lady, Madam Isabella Tarina.

HONOURABLE Madam, how my unworthiness may hope of your goodness, I cannot find, but in the Notes of your Nobleness, which as it might well challenge the height of your Title, so hath it bind a world of Servants to your labour: among whom my self more desirous then able to deserve the least of your countenance, am now presumptuous to trouble you with an humble suit. I have a sister of years sufficient to understand betwixt god and evil, and of disposition I thank God not amiss: Her bringing up hath been chiefly at her Mothers and Daughters; yet is she not unfurnished of her parts, fit for a servant of her place; which if it might stand with your good pleasure, should be to attend your honour in your Chamber. Her truth I will undertake for; her diligence diligence I will not doubt of, her kind nature I can speak of, and her affection to your Ladyship I know is not a little: If therefore in all these she may be pleasing to your entertainment, I shall be bound to your good favours, in the honour of her preferment; which being the highest advancement that her duty can deserve, I cease her service, with mine own, to your honourable employment. So craving pardon for my boldness, with favour to my suit, I humbly take my leave.

Your Ladyships in all humbleness, E. W.

To my beloved God-father; T. B.

Godfather, at the Font you gave me a Name, and as I have heard and read of others, you undertook to see me brought up in learning, and in the fear of God. I do not remember that ever I yet received penny from you towards the charge thereof; and you having neither charge of wife or children, might do well to bestow your blessing upon me, in somewhat better then a bare hand, which will buy nothing. Is it possible that having one foot in the grave, the other should be so far off? Am I your nearest in nature, and shall I be farthest off in love? I know not the cause; but whatever it be, misconceived in kindness. Let me intreat you to believe my love, and I desire no more: for when you are weary of the flattery of those that flie upon you, among the great showes of your kindness that you daily rain down upon their heads, you will I hope bestow one drop of grace upon my grounds. I will urge nothing but your will, and will love you more then they that tell you more. We not contented to gather for them that gaze for your goods; and be not fast-bound to him who loves you more then all you have: and the god that you will do, let it be in your life, that you may see your contentment in the issue of your kindness. Loth I am to weary you with words, and therefore in love of a true heart, which daily prayeth for your health and hearts ease, hoping that God will move you for my good, whosoever is a mean of my hurt, I cease further at this time to trouble you, but rest always in duty of my humble love,

Your affectionate God-Son, T. B.

To my dearest beloved friend on Earth, H. W. of London

Honest Harry, out of a troubled Spirit of a tormented heart, I write to thee; and therefore bear with my skill, if it be not in the pleasing nature of so good an humour as I could wish; and thou art worthy of. But as I know thee able to judge of colors better then the blind eyes and beetle heads; and of that true kindness that can and doth rather comfort the afflicted, then increase the sorrows of the distressed: Let me impart to thee some part of my passion, that patience in thy pity may the better play her part in my spirit. What shall I say? I live as without life, pleased in nothing, crossed in all hopes, put in many fears, languishing in my sorrows, and troubled with the grief of a wounded conscience: Not with the horror of Warther, the fear of Treason, or delight of Sin; but with the cruelty of Fortune, the unkindness of Friends, and the breach of Credit; and most of all, with them whom I most love. O God, my heart aketh, and blame it not; and my Spirit mourneth, and reprove it not: For though Patience be a Virtue that maketh men Divine, yet there is but one Christ, and men are no Angels. And let me tell the truth. The misery of my life is intolerable in the sense of nature: For compare the afflictions of the most patient with the causes of my Passions, and provide a work of pity to behold the Day of my Miseries: Hath one man been wealthy, and become poor, so am I: Hath another suffered wrong, so do I: another buried Parents, Children, and dear Friends, so have I: another travelled far in hope of gain, and returned with loss, so have I: another been wounded in the Wars, fared hard, lain in a cold Bed many a bitter Storm, and been at many a hard Banquet, all these have I: another imprisoned, so have I: another long lain sick, so have I: another plagued with an unquiet Wife, so am I: another indebted to his hearts grief, and fain would pay and cannot, so am I: in sum, any of these crosses are able to break the heart of a kind Spirit; and all these lie at once so heavy upon my heart, as nothing but the hand of God can remove; besides my continual toil for the reward of uneasiness, while that which should be my comfort, is my corrosive. Imagine how with all this I can live, and think what a death it is thus to live: O for the scorn of the proud, the abuse of the ungracious, the scoff of the foolish, and the scaming of the unkind; the company of the discontented, and the want of the most affected; the disgrace of Learning, the loss of time, and the misery of want; if there be a Hell on Earth, it cannot be far from the Cave of my discomfort; where I am sure, the Devil seeing my desire to serve God, layeth all the bars he can in the way for my discomfort:

comfort : But I besee him, and hope in Christ, that my living and loving God, who hath tried my soul in adversities, will one day in his mercy so look upon me, that the Devil shall be driven back from his purpose, and the tears of my body wiped away. I shall resource in such a joy, as all my grief clean forgotten, my heart and soul shall in the joy of my sense, in the Heavenly harmony of a holy Psalm sing a new Song of Praise to the glory of my Saviour. For the bettering whereof in my deliberance from my toiments, and comforts in his mercies, I will frame daily my prayers, and be assured of the Amen. But I fear I am too tedious, and therefore will thus end : God continue my patience, but not my sorrows, give me deliberance from my miseries, and make me thankful for his blessings, and bless thee with as much happiness as thou knowest I want. So leaving my hopes to his mercies, and us both to his tuition, I rest with as little rest as I think any man can rest.

Thine of not mine own, N. B.

To his fair Mistress, and hearts honour, Mistress A. L.

LADY, I have been to ill a Scholar to Love, that I never yet learned the courting of Beauty; no; would I willingly use Art to abuse Nature, and therefore if plain truth in my mind favour, I will use no Attourney in this cause, which being to be judged in your kindness, I will only cry audience, and stand to your arbitrament. My case being my own Lawyer, thus I plead : Your eyes hath stolen my heart, now I must either be accessory to my own hurt, or accuse you of the felony; but rather willing to lose my life in your eyes, then keep them to look on other light, I will onely appeal to your self, what to do in this passion. If I love, you must know it; for your eyes hath my heart, and I lose my heart, you must have it, for your eyes are well worthy of it : but now you have it, preserve it for your service; let it not die in displeasure, that hath no life but in your love. If it could speak it would tell you how dearly, highly, and onely it honours you; and if you will believe it, you shall quickly find it : For if it is dedicated to your service, and care but of your favour, keep it then to your use, use it to your pleasure, and let it die in no other comfort. In sum, not to dwell upon ceremonies, it is nothing mine, but all yours, and if it may live in your eyes, it seeks no other heaven in this World : Dye it not then from you, that hath no life but in you, and take it wholly to you, that is as nothing without you; So leaving it with my self, to the honour of your onely service, I take my leave for this time, but will rest ever, Yours vowed and devoted, R. S.

To his very good friend, Master W. B. For the borrowing of forty pounds for six moneths.

SIR, I know you loathe no long Letters, and my suit being to most men so unpleasant, I would be loath to be tedious. I have purchased a piece of Land, and laid out all my money; now upon the sudden an unexpected occasion puts me to an extraordinary charge; for the furnishing whereof, I am constrained to try my good friends; among which, presuming of your kind promise upon my urgent occasion to stand me in stead: I am to intreat you by this Bearer to help me to forty pounds, wherein you will so much pleasure me, as so much may do; and as I can requite it, I will not forget it. I would have it for six moneths, my day I will not break; I will take it kindly, and deserve it thankfully: my servant is trusty, and therefore I pray you send it by him. And as you will be assured of my love, feed me not with delays, or excuse; for I know you have it, and you know I will pay. Thus loth to use you like a Broker, to send you a Waton, as an honest Neighbour let me be beholding to your kindness, in which you shall give me cause in the like, or a greater matter to rest upon, at as short a warning,

Your assured friend to use, R. H.

To the Right worshipful my very good Master, Sir Thomas Ward Knight, at his House in Padow.

SIR, after my humble duty, I have talked with others of those parties to whom you directed me, touching the benefit to be made of the suit which you have in hand, whose opinions I find divers: yet all agree in this, that if you can prove it irrevocable, the money will be augmented; otherwise, they are loth to engage their names and credits so far upon bare hopes: for times are uncertain, and in change of times, divers things fall out contrary to expectation. You shall therefore do well before you trouble any of them in it, to make sure of the matter, in such sort as may be best for your profit: for the suit being effected to good purpose, leave me to deal in it to your content. There is much mattering that you are like to be crossed in it, I would therefore wish you to try your strength in it, and not to slip time, for it is precious in a good cause. Bear with me, I beseech you, if I move your patience in urging your speed, for it is for your own good. Against your coming to Town, I will have have somewhat else for you to set on foot; for he that will work, must not have the fire without an iron: but knowing your business, I will forbear at this time to trouble you with idle News; and onely praying for your health and hearts ease, commit the consideration of your own affairs to the managing of your good discretion; and humbly take my leave for this time, always

NON-payment of debts, is not onely a crack in credit, but a loss of Friends. Upon a Letter I furnished your want, and Fortune having been your friend, a large conscience methinketh doth not well. Your excuse yet I know not, nor can well devise it; but acquaint me with it, that I may not wrong your disposition; for a settled affection expecteth the like measure in kindness. The money you had of me was not much, but if it hath done you a pleasure I am glad of it: and if you can well spare it, by this Bearer I pray you return it; for the cause why you detain it. I have lately bought Sheep to store a Pasture that I have to Farm, and my money being short, I am bold to write to you for mine own, which if it come it shall be welcome, if not, so that I know how it may tread you, I will forbear: and for the conference between your Son and my Daughter, I think they are more ready for us then we for them. Your mind I know, and am contented with it: For as I see their proceedings, we will soon fall upon agreement. And to be plain with you, I think I had best rather to provide you more money, then demand any more that you have: and therefore making your excuse in this onely point of affection, intreating pardon for my plain manner of writing; assuring you, that if this matter go forward, (as it is no other like) as their loves, so shall our purges be one. And thus hoping of your health as mine own, with commendations to your kind Son, your Self, and your Shew, I commit you to the Almighty.

To a Judge in the behalf of an Offender.

My good Lord, your honourable care of Justice I hope is seasoned with the charitable wait of mercy: for though the Law cutteth off offence by sharp punishment, yet death takes away repentance; and where there is sorrow, there is sign of grace. The best Judge of true Justice Christ Jesus, pardoned the great sinner, and with the gentle rebuke of Sin no more, called her to great grace. Now shall Justice upon the first fact use another course upon an offender: I know it is your oath to do all manner of Justice, yet may you give time of repentance in relieving this poor man, whose pardon will be easily attained: Your Honour shall do a good deed; God, in imitating his course to Justice, will surely regard and reward you, the patient Offender shall be found ever to pray for you, my self with all his friends will truly honour you, and no doubt but our King, who is full of mercy, when his Majesty shall hear of it, will commend your wisdom therefore your Honour to stay the Sentence of Death untill the next Assize, or grant him a Reprieve till the said time. Leaving the poor mans life to a word of your mouth, with my humble and bounden service to your good health, and all other happiness, I humbly take my leave,

Your Admirers humble servant, D. H.

A Letter of Complement. To my very good friend, Master H. W. at his House in Arthingworth.

SIR, if I could have let pass so fit a Messenger, without some thankful remembrance, I were unworthy of so good a friend, but your kindness being such as will ever work in a good mind, I pray you let me salute you with this little token of my love: The Rindlet is of such sack, as Bristol hath no better, and the Sugar-loaf for your Lady I assure you is right Barbary, which at this time is here of some price: but upon the ceasing of the Troubles there, I hope we shall have it cheap here: in the mean time whatsoever it be, what you need command in that, or what else may be in my power to accomplish. And so wishing I were with you at the killing of one of your fat Bucks, which with hearty commendations to your self and your good Web-fellow, and many thanks to you both for your good cheer, and most kind entertainment, hoping to see you at my house at your coming to Town, where you shall make your own welcome, I commit you to the Almighty. To his assured friend Mr. Thomas Rife, at his house in the Strand, intreating his help in dispatch of business.

Against this time of my attendance upon the Judge of this circuit, I shall have occasion to use many things, whereof I am now furnished. Your skill in choosing the best, and knowing the prices, I know long since by your kindness in the like trouble; and therefore I intreat you once more to take a little pains, with this Bearer, my Servant, in helping him in the laying out of his money upon such parcels, as in my Note for my use I have let down: your travel or kindness shall not unthankfully be forgotten, and wherein I may in this Countrey or elsewhere please you, you shall not fail of my best means. If you have any News, I pray you acquaint me with them, and if the Ship be come from the Indies, what good success they have had. But earnest business makes me briefer then I otherwise would be; and therefore hoping of your health, and not doubting of your kindness, with hearty commendations, I commit you to the Almighty.

To his good friend, R. M. concerning the purchase of certain Lands,

SIR, whereas you wrote unto me, touching the sale of your Lordship of Bar, I cannot answer you for two causes; the one the price is too high, the other your hast of money is too great. For touching your price, the Land you know is much impaired since the death of your Father, the Woods are low and very backward, by cutting it afore the full growth, and your Trees are so wasted, that there is scarce a piece of Timber worth the selling. Your Wood is shrewdly spoiled for want of draining, and your Pastures are so overgrown with Bashes, that it will ask great cost in rubbing, before it be brought to any good pass; yet notwithstanding, for that we have been upon speech for it, and that you seem willing to deal with me, if you will pitch a reasonable price, your money shall not be long deferred: I pray you therefore, if I may have it as I told you, if it be a hundred pounds more I care not, but rather indeed I will not go a penny. Let me know your mind by this Bearer out of hand, so; I am offered (I think) a better bargain: but so; my words sake, and the rather to be your neighbour, that we may now and then have a game or two at Bowls. Hoping so; your good health, and your Bed-fellows, I commit you to the Almighty. From my house this 13 of June, 1652.

Your very loving friend, E. R.

A Letter to a proud Mistress.

How beauty will make a Fool proud, I would your Blatter-work did not witness: But had you wit to help wickedness, you would put a Barret out of countenance. Your countenance is made after your conceit, as full of merry tricks as a Donkey; and so; your set-face, I think you have some hairs, you walk so nicely as upon egg-shells. Your hair is none of your own, and so; your steeple-tire, it is like the gaud of a Maid Parrain: so that had you a Fool by the hand, you might walk where you would in a Morris-dance. O fine come to it, how it stables like a Hackney that would tire at half a mile. Well, your Tobacco-breath, with your toothless Chaps, will be shortly such bad Ware, that you will stand in the Parket, and no man bid a penny for you. But what do I mean to spoil paper with such matter, and therefore I will abruptly end: Wash your face, scour your hand, put on a clean Smock, get you to your prayers, repent your wickedness, and mourn to death so; your souls sake, so; your carcass is not worth carrying to the earth. And so hoping that in a good humour you will do somewhat better then hang your self, I leave you to this mishap that finds you the most filthy creature on the Earth, till you be never more seen in the World,

Your poor friend at a pinch, B. T.

The answer of a witty but railing Wench.

Betwixt a railing Knave and a Rascal, what is the difference? And from a filthy Rogue, what can be looked for but a Louse; O Devil incarnate, who ever knew such a Villain. Your hair I will not meddle with so; fear of a fall: But I wonder the Jewellers do not deal with you so; a face, where a pin can scarce stand between a Bead and a Ruby. Oh the French rhyme bids you keep out of the wind, so; fear your levell staks scarce hold a rotten carcass. Now instead of a Morris-dance, you know the Hey up Holborn, where the Hangman at the Gallows stages to learn you a new turn: But thou wretched woman, un-

unworthy the name of a man, get thee to thy knees, ask forgiveness of all the World, make thy confession in the Court, and commend thy soul to the Lord, for thy flesh the Dogs will not meddle with: And so in haste, hoping my Letter may come to thee before the last cast, I end in haste, Thy charitable friend, B. C.

A Letter of Challenge to a young Swaggerer.

Sirrah, your swaggering is so foolish, that the children laugh at you where you go; and for your valour, if your feather be away, your sword will do no hurt. Your tossing of pots fear none but Flies, and for your brave words they are nothing but wind. But lest I do you some pleasure intelling you of your faults, let it suffice to make an end of all matters: To morrow in the morning you shall have me by right of the clock in the field beyond your lodging, near unto the Pool; where, if you dare come alone, you shall find me without company, ready to do more then I will speak; till when, expecting no other answer then your self, I rest,

Your avowed enemy, I. T.

A dogged Answer.

Do you imagine me a Philistine, that you begin to play Goliath in a Letter: I assure you if your deeds be like your words, my feather will not abide your windy words: but for my sword, it hath no point, and therefore cares not a point for you. If you be not drunk, I muse what madness doth possess you: but the best is, I hope now you have spoken, you have done; for I will be there where you appoint, but I doubt you will not perform: but as you tell me of my faults, I hope to whip you for yours; and sorry to have lost so much time about idleness, I end, Yours as I have reason, F. R.

To my very good Cousin Master I. D. at his House in Swands.

Cousin, I understand you are determined to put your younger Son Apprentice to a Merchant; believe me I highly commend your resolution herein: For I that have travelled far, and seen much, can speak somewhat of them, and their noble Profession. I could well give it a higher title; as a right Merchant is a Royal fellow, he is desirous to so much, to trabel much, and sometime to gain a little; both adventure much; though sometime for a little adventure he doth gain much: But what are the sundry natures of perils as well at Sea as at Land, as well of his goods as of his person, none knoweth, but himself, or like himself. But having trabelled far, and finished his voyage, after his safe Return, having given God thanks, note what is the course of his life, to observe a comely Order in the City, and enrich many poor men by retailing of his Goods, who sit at ease and sell in their Shops, that which he with great toil and danger fetched out of far Countreys. Now say his gain be great, let it be answered in the desert of his Trabel; Shall a fair or fine Horse brought out of Barbary, be here finely kept, well fed, and neatly dressed, and richly attired, and shall not a Merchant that hath trabelled many miles beyond Barbary, be thought worthy of a fine House, good Land, daintie fare, and an honourable Title, for the resolution of his adventure, and the toil of his trabel? Shall a Lute or a Cittern, brought out of Italy, be put in a Case of Velvet, and faced with Gold for well sounding, and shall not a Merchant that fetcht that Lute, and went far further then that Countrey for better Commodities, be thought worthy of his gain, and honoured for his mind? Shall the Lawyer sell breath at a high rate, and shall the Merchant be grugged the price of his Wares? What shall I say, Who upholds the state of the City, or the honour of a State under the King, but the Merchant? Who beautifieth a Court with jewels and outward Ornaments, but the trabel of a Merchant? Who beautifies the Gardens with sundry sorts of Fruits and Flowers, but the trabeling Merchant? He may well be called the Merchant, the Sea-singer, or the maker of the Sea to sing; the Sea-singer, when he hath fair wind, and good weather, he maketh the Sea to sing, when he sees the goodly Houses that float upon her Waves, and cast an Anchor in her Sands. But let me leave the Sea, and come to the Land: Consider of the sweet and civil manner of their lives; whose houses more neat, whose wives more modest, whose apparel more comely, whose diet more daintie, and whose carriage more commendable, valiant without quarrels, merry without moans, bountiful in their gifts, and very neat and choice in their banquets. Whose Children are better nurtured, whose Servants better governed, whose House better stuffed and maintained. Furthermore, what comfort have the distressed found beyond the Seas, and how many poor do they relieve at home. What Colledges, what Hospitales, what Alms-houses have they builded, and in effect what Cities have they enlarged, and what Countreys have they enriched, how few Lawyers can say so. If that be all true, with much more might be said in their honour, give them their right, I say the Merchant is a Royal fellow, and go forwards with your intent, If you will ever have your

Don.

Don see any thing, know any thing, do any thing, or be worth any thing, put him to a Merchant; and give with him such a portion, as out of his years may set up his Trade or Traffick: Doubt not he will do well, and think not he can almost do better. So beseeching God to bless him in all his courses, without which he will be worse then nothing. I pray you do as I wish you, change him to serve God, and to turn him to the world. And thus having truly written to you my opinion touching my purpose, wishing health, and honour, and all hapiness to all worthy true Merchants, in hope of your health I commit you to the Almighty.

Arthingworth this twentieth of August, 1652.

Your very loving Cousin, N. B.

To his dearest, fairest, and worthiest of love, honour, and service, Mistress E. E.

If I should commend you (fairest of Women) above the Moon, and compare you with the Sun, you would put me in the Clouds for a flatterer; but knowing your own worth, and finding the substance of my truth, you cannot blame me, in admiration to speak truth of your perfection; which of what power it is in drawing the service of reason, if you would believe, love would quickly tell you: But the cause of inconsistency in the unwise, breedeth distrust of truth in the most faithful; but all birds are not of one feather, nor all men of one mind. In brief, not to make a long harvest of a little corn, which being ripe would be gathered in a good time. Let truth be my spokes-man, and belief my comfort; the hope whereof as my only Worlds happiness, referring only to the care of your kindness in the faith of true affection, I rest,

Your avowed and assured friend, N. B.

A Letter to a friend to borrow a piece of money.

Since nothing more trieth a friend then calamity, so there is nothing more grievous then to be beholding: My kindness therefore, if I may become your debtor for five pounds, it is not much, yet will it pleasure me more then a little. Your appointed day I will not break with you, and wherein I may thankfully requite you, you shall find no forgetfulness of your kindness. But time is precious, and therefore intreating you speed answer, in hope of no denial I rest,

Your assured friend, T. W.

The Answer.

I should be as glad to pleasure you as any man, but truth cannot be blamed for, with more then for necessary use; that I cannot spare, I am not presently furnished: I pray you therefore take not a denial unkindly; for if my credit will pleasure you, I will not fail my best to do you good; if otherwise you would urge me, it will be to little purpose: And therefore sorry that I am not in tune to satisfie your expectation, I must leave patience to your kind discretion, which as you know me, shall command me; for I am and will be, to the uttermost of my power,

Your assured friend, D. S.

A Letter of good counsel to his Mistress, H. C. at her House in Pe-Chest.

My good Cousin, I remember at my last being with you, we had some conference about consideration: Believe me, when I consider the world, and what I have seen in it, and the best things of it, and that all in effect is as nothing, or rather worse, if any thing at all. I wonder how men, who have so much judgement of god from evil, how can those men that know the uncertain time of death, live as though they thought never to die; How can he that heareth or readeth the Word of God, and believeth the truth of it, be so careless of it, and so disobedient to it; Will men be sick that may be whole; or die that may live; What shall I say, but as Paul said to the Corinthians, O ye foolish people, who hath bewitched you? It is the Word of God, that transgression is as the sin of witchcraft: And surely if men were not bewitched with sin, they could not delight in wickedness, being the cross-bar to all their happiness. Could the Thief consider the doom of the Law, or the misery of the dispoiled, surely he would not steal: If the Adulterer did consider the filthiness of his action, and the shame of his folly, surely he would turn honest: If the Murderer did but consider the horror of death, and the terror of sin, he would never kill: In brief, if any Sinner would look into the foul nature of sin, he would be out of love with it; and if he did consider the power of Gods wrath, he would be afraid of it: nay, could, or would man consider the goodness of God towards him, in commanding and forbidding nothing but that which is good for him, how could he be so forgetful of his own god, in offending the Author of all goodness,

If the watchful could consider the misery of want, surely he would not be careless of his estate: if the covetous could consider the misery of the poor, he would be more charitable: if the swaggerer could consider the comeliness of sobriety, and the shame of immodesty, surely he would be more civil: if the Magistrate did but consider the misery of the poor, would not be so careless of their torment, and put them to such sorrow; but remember, that Justice without Mercy is too near a touch of Tyranny: if he that preacheth the Word, and followeth it not, could consider the heaviness of Gods judgements, and the shame of his folly, he would doubtless be more careful of his soul, and more kind to his flock: if the Lawyer could consider the Law of God, he would never grieve his Client, nor speak against a known truth; but as I said before, to leave tediousness, it is the only lack of consideration, that maketh the heedless will of man to run the way of error, to the ruin of his best comfort: And therefore I intreat you, notwithstanding my allowance of your judgment touching the heavenly Providence and Power, in the motion of all good actions; yet so to allow of my opinion touching want of consideration, that it is one of the greatest causes of the confusion of reason, by the corruption of nature. And knowing that the care of your consideration is such, as both and may give example to most expert men to follow the rule of your directions in the whole course of life, wishing my self so happy as to enjoy the company of so good a friend, till I see you, and ever I rest in fast settled affection,

Your loving friend, N. B.

To my sweet Love, Mistress E. P.

Sweet Love, if absence could breed forgetfulness, the fortune should do much harm to affection; but when the eye of the mind looketh into the top of the heart, the sentence may well be spoken. As in silence you may hear me, so in absence you may see me; for love is not of an hours burnour, nor a shadow of light, but it is a light of the spirit, and a continuing passion: think not therefore I do or can forget thee, or love my self: but for thee. Shortly I hope to see thee, and in the mean time though not with thee, yet not from thee, nor will be at rest with my self, till I may rest onely with thee, I rest always to rest,

I am onely and all, F. W.

Her Answer.

My dear, if delays were not a death to love, excuse were currant in the construction of kindness; but sentences are better spoken.

Spoken then understood; and a pleasing presence is better than an excused absence. Remembrance is good, but possession is better, and love holdeth memory but a kind of melancholy. Let your self therefore be the messenger rather of your love than your Letters, lest Fortune in a mad fit be cross to your best comfort; not in respect of my constancy, but my Valentines unkindness. This is all I will write at this time, but wishing a happy time to the beginning of never ending, I rest till that time, and all times one and the same.

Yours as you know, E. P.

An old mans Letter to a young Widow.

WIDOW, I have neither a smooth face, nor a filed tongue to cheat your eyes, nor abuse your ears withal; but a true heart and a constant mind that both inwardly love you, and will never deceive you. Fickle heads and unbroiled wills know not where or how to bestow themselves; when their wits go a wool-gathering among shrews that have had faces. They may be kind, but not constant; and Love loves no out-lets: but tribes, light heads have no stayed heels, and a little wealth is soon spent. Who knoweth the woe of want, can tell you the difference between an old mans Darling, and a young mans Darling: Why? how can they love that scarce knows how to like? I know you have many Suitors of worth, but none that I think more worthy then my self: for none can love you so much, nor esteem you so well; for I have known the World, and care not for it, nor for any thing but you: If therefore all I have may please you, and my self to love and honour you, make my comfort your contentment, and I will seek no other Paradise in this World. Thus hoping that reason in your labour will effect the hope of my affection, leaving you to your self, to be your self, I rest,

Yours or not mine, T. P.

Her Answer.

SIR, I could never see you, but in a Letter: I should delight much in your presence, but contraries are not correspondent. A gray head, and a green mind fit not; your persuasions were forcible, were not your self of too much weakness; but though for your good will, I thank you, yet for nothing will I be indebted to you, no, not for a world would I be troubled with you: For as our years, so I fear

our

our fancies will be different; and the patience needing cooler may breed anger, when to be an old mans Darling, is a kind of curse to Nature. You say well, who can love, that knows not how to like. When the senses are incapable of their comfort, what is imagination but a dream? A blind man can judge no Colour, a deaf man hath no skill in Music, a dumb man no Eloquence, and an old man little feeling in Loves Passion. For my Suitors, they lose my time, and serve their own, and for their worth, I shall judge of the most worthy. Not for their wits, if they lose not their own senses, let them gather Wood where they can; but for your love, I will not venture on it, lest being too old, it be not sweet: And for my young Suitors, I hope I shall take heed of a shadowed solowness: As for Fortune, while Vertue governs Affection, I will not fear my felicity. So hoping your own reason will persuade you to have patience with your passion, and leave me to my better comfort, meaning to be as you wish me, my self, and none other, I rest,

Not yours, if mine own, P. M.

A Letter of a young man to his Sweet-heart.

My Love, if I could have as good passage as my Letters, I would be a better messenger of my thoughts, then my words can express, but as the secret of my heart, which none can see but your eyes, nor shall know but your kindness; let me not then languish in the lingering hope of my desires, but hasten my comfort in the onely answer of your consent. You know the house of our first meeting of our fantasies, the true countenance of our irreparable affections, and why will you not appoint the conclusion of our comfort? Trial cannot let you doubt my Love, and Love will be sworn for the security of my truth; both which thus far pleading for me in your judgement: For imprisoned I am in your beauty, bound in the hands of your service, and live but in the hope of your favour, in which I rest ever, and only to rest happy in this world.

Yours though not yours, R. E.

An Answer to her Love.

My Sweet, I rather wish your self then your Letter, though in the lack of your desire, your presence had been to little purpose: for Weds are in a good way, that are subscribed and sealed: But till the delivery be made, the matter is not fully finished. Wadethers.

fore patience for a time, for it is soon enough that is well enough; and yet I confesse in kindness, delay is little comfort, yet say for a fair day, though it be almost at noon, be persuaded of my affection, and let faith be no fortune, for love can be no laughing; and so imagine of my self. When you offend, I will punish you; and when you do please, I will praise you. Be assuring truth beliefe, and love comfort, I rest so soon as I will may, to give the reason of your best rest, and till then, and ever will rest,

~~For the first time I have written to you since I came to London. I have been very busy, but I have not forgotten you. I have been thinking of you very much, and I have been writing to you very often. I have been thinking of you very much, and I have been writing to you very often. I have been thinking of you very much, and I have been writing to you very often.~~

A merry Letter of News to a Friend.

Right Trosan, I know thou lovest no complement, nor carest for any tricks; but as a good fellow and a friend, wouldst hear how the world goeth. All the world I am not acquainted with, and therefore I know not what to say to it; but for the little part of it, the petty place or Parish where I dwell, and some few miles about it, I will tell you there is a fall of Conies, for there is such a world of them every day in the Market, that except they be young and fat, there is little money to be gotten for them. Backney Jades are scarce worth their meat, and every house hath such a Dog, that not a Begger dare come near the door, and naba House at a Chase, but a Cat is at her heels. Paid Partian of late was got with child in her sleep, and the Hobby-horse was half mad that the Fool should be the Father of it. A great talk there is of setting up a new Tavern, but Tobacco is the thing that will vent the old Hack. There is spoken so much gibberish, that we have almost forgot our Mother Tongue; for every day in our School hath Latin at his fingers end; marry it is in a book, for all his wit is in his Cope, for in capric he hath little. Our Free-School is new painted with wisdom over the Gate; for within, except some unhappy way, there is no more wit then is necessary. Now for the other News I will tell you, wet weather frights us with a bad Harvest, and Alurers are half mad for lack of offence of their money. Law was never more in use, nor men more out of money; and for women they are strange creatures, for some of them have three faces, and so fine in proud paces, that if they carry it as they do, they will put many men out of countenance: For other ordinary matters, they are as you left them; a pot of Ale is worth a penny, a Bawd will have brave Clothes, the man in the Moon is above the Clouds, and the Knave of Clubs will still make one in the Stock. Other things there are that I am shortly to acquaint you with; in the mean time write unto me how thou dost, and how the wind blows on your your side; and so long I have no good thing to send thee, with the love of my heart I commend thee to the Almighty, and so I leave thee to his care. Thine to the end, R. B.

The Answer.

Thou mad Willain, what hath walkt about thy brains, to put thy wit in such a temper; a tale of a Tub, and the bottom out, Well, to requite your kindness, you shall know somewhat of our World. So it is, that the For hath made an end with most of our fat Cattle, the Wolf meets with our Lambs, before they can well go from the Dam, and the Water-Rat hath spoiled our Fish-pots, that if it had not been caught with a Trap, we might have gone to Sea for a red Herring. Our Bay-liffe Bulls run through all the Rye in our Parish, and the Tanners Dog hath worried a wild Sow. The Bayliffe of our Hundred takes upon him like a Justice, and since the new Ale-house was set up, the Constable is much troubled: but though Oats be rank, and Rye be ripe, Wheat is but thin, and Barley short. God followeth goes down the wind, and yet Wenches are right head. Our Piper is taken sick of an Alexander, and old Huddle got a blow at midnight, that makes him straddle all day. Parnel shall have her Sweet-heart in spite of Tom-Tinker, and there is wondring in the Town, that thou art not in the Goal before the Sessions: But be thou of good cheer, there is time enough for a good turn; and come when thou wilt, thou shalt make thine own welcome. I would have let me be merry with thee a little, for thou knowest I love thee. The Grandfire is going to his Grave, and hath bequeathed thee a blackes portion: The Bell hath gone for him, but so soon as he is past, I will send thee word in Post, that for grief of his death thou mayest drink to all Christian souls. Thy Sister is where she was, and swears thou art honeste then thy Father. I will say no more, but thou hast friends that thou knowest not, and therefore come when thou wilt, we will have a health ere we part. And so in hast farewell.

Thine to the proof, R. S.

To a young man going to travel beyond the Sea.

God Cousin, I find by your last Letter your present intent to travel, I pray God it may fall out for your good. For though in respect of your years, your body be in good state to endure some hardnets, yet there is difference in the natures of Countreys, both in the air and diet; but above these things, there are many things to be observed, that negligently regarded may be greatly to your hurt: As first, for your Religion have a great care, that your eyes lead not your heart after the doctores of Idolatry; serve God sincerely not fondly, not in the way, but in truth of zeal, and for all your comfort in all your course, that you trust in him, and none else. Secondly, for your carke, take heed of too much following the feminine way, and pray for continency: it is a blessed vertue. I speak not this for the common sort; for I hope your spirit is too high to stoop to such a game, but for the wryens, whose faces are bewitching objects, and whose voices are enchanting Musick: if these be in the way of your ear, or eye, haste thou from them, lest too late thou find it too true, that you will hardly escape drowning, when you are over head and ears. Such weeds will hang about your heels, as will so hinder your swimming, that you will hardly overcome it in health, if you hap to escape with your life. Furthermore, if you meet with some chaste Penelope, whose beauty walks even with vertue, let not a chaste eye in her begget an unchaste thought in you. I speak not this in fear of any thing but your youth; yet though I know you well disposed in many ways, I doubt you are not right in all: And this being a thing that I know most necessary, I thought in my love to give you a note of. Beware for your parts, let it be private to your own knowledge, lest it be an occasion of your unhappiness, and byed you more partakers then for profit. Beware for your Tongue, let it follow your wit, and tip it with truth, that it may abide all touch: and for your diet, let it be sparing; for better leave with an appetite, then go to physick for a surfeit. Beware for your conversation, choose the wise, rather hear them then trouble them, and against all fortunes take patience in your passage. So serving God, and observing the world, no doubt but you will make benefit of your voyage, and I will be joyful of your return. And thus loth to tire you with a long tale, when I know in a little, you will understand much. In prayer for your good success, and safe return, I commit you to the Almighty.

Attinghamworth 24. of July, 1632.

Your affectionate kinsman, E. M.

To his friend G. T. in the time of sickness and sorrow, for a great misfortune.

Dear George, knowing the cause, though not the condition of the sickness, I am bold a little to advise thee for the better recovery of the death. Thou knowest (dear friend) that there is nothing pallid neither neither under nor above the Heavens, but either by the direction of permission of the wisdom of the Almighty. There is no Day that hath not his Night, no Element that hath not his contrary, no Comfort on the Earth without a Cross. Thou art sorry to see the cruelty of Fortune; but turn thine eyes to a better light, and thou shalt see it a trial of Gods love:

For if Nature be accursed for sin, thou must find it in this world or another: the second death is worse then the first. If sickness make thee feel Gods hand, shall not patience make thee try his mercy: and health make thee know his love: If losses make thee poor, wert thou not better with patience be Gods beggar, then in pride the worlds King. Grieve not then at thy fortune, but live by thy faith: be rather a Job then a Saul; for there is no Spurning against so sharp a prick as Gods purpose. I am sorry for thy sickness, but more for the cause: For to mourn to no end is meer folly; and a pining sickness is a sign of more passion then patience. Christ suffered for thee, suffer thou for thy self; lay away thy too much melancholy; for sighing is womanish, and weeping is babish. Be wise therefore for thy self, and be good to thy self; pluck up thy spirits, and put thy self onely upon God. Live not like a dead man, but die like a living man: Let not Fortune be a messenger of Death, nor impatience a prejudice to thy health. Take thy Hoale and ride over to me, and take the time as it falls:
if fair, the fewer cloths; if foul, take a cloak; but defer not the time, for thought pierceth apace: and for the mind, there is no Physick but patience and mirth; bring the first with thee, and the last I will provide for thee: Till when, wishing thee out of thy solemn Cell, and to take my house for thy better comfort, till I see thee, and always I rest, Thine in all love, D. R.

An Answer to the same.

How easily the healthful can give counsel to the sick, and how hardly they can take it, I would I were not in case to prove: But I see Patience needs not to be perswaded; for where pain is, he will be entertained. I know there is no resisting of Gods power, nor murthering against it, but yet think that the flesh and blood in many things hath much ado to bear it: and though Fortune be a fiction, yet it troubleth many fine wits; and the trial of patience puts the best spirit to a hard point. Better to have had, is little woe to want; but to lose, hopeles of recovery, with sting the heart of a good mind. A sorrow is sooner taken, then put off; and death is comfortable to the afflicted. Fools cannot take thought, and braves will not; but the honest and the careful understand the plague of misery: If death be this way ordained me, I cannot avoid it; and if help come unlooked for, I shall be glad of it: But if you will take the pains to make me try the comfort of your company, my self shall have some room to entertain a friend for such a need; and knowing your love, can account no less. I pray you therefore without further ceremonies, let me see you very shortly: if I live you shall know my kindness; if I die, you shall find my love: So drawing towards a fiftieths fit, I am forced thus to conclude in the spirit of Fortune. In the grace of God I will digest what I can, and pray for patience for the rest. And so hoping speedily to see you, till then, and always I rest,

In sickness and in health thine what mine, R. H.

A younger Brother to his elder, fallen unhappily on a little wealth, and suddenly grown fondly proud.

God Brother, as I am glad to hear of your health, so I am sorry to hear of your ill carriage. It is told me by them that I can believe, that your wealth which should make you gracious, makes you in a manner odious. Why, it is wonderful, that you can so suddenly metamorphose your mind from wit to folly. It grieveth me to hear your description of almost as many as know you: it is said, you look over the Pond, walk as upon Stilts, speak as it were for Charity, and with a swelling conceit of your wealth, make your face like one of the four Winds: in your apparel you are so womanish, your Ruffs set up in print, your Beard so starched, and your Countenance so set, that you are more meet for a Prologue before a Comedy, then to give example to Civility. Formality is a kind of folly, when he that walks upright like a Rabbit, is like a Boy that should say Grace. They say you are seldom without a flower in your mouth, I would it were stily perfumed for the desert of your folly. You wear your Cloak as maps broad, that one may see your Silken inside, and your Garters beneath your knee are ready to sweep for a Rose. All these notes are taken of you; and withal, that to maintain this pride, you are so covetous as the Devil: for as I hear, you are both an Usurer and a Broker, and have more cunning tricks in your Trade, then an honest heart could away withal. Truly this is not well, for your Estate needs it not, your education doth not teach it: let me therefore intreat you to turn a new leaf, sing a new song; be courteous, not covetous; be kind, but not proud; and have a conscience in all your courses;

for

for there must be an end of all your matters, and repentance will be the best payment of your ill taken accounts: Believe it, for you shall find it at last, I wish not too late. And so out of the sincere love of a true heart, that holds you as dear as his own life, rather desirous to tell you what I find amiss in you, then to loath you in what I find grievous in you; to his grace that may amend you, with my prayers for you, I leave you.

Your true loving Brother, R. Bland.

To a fair proud T.

FAIR Mistress, why should you turn that to a curse, which was given you for a blessing? I mean your beauty, which should have made you gracious, but hath filled you so full of pride, that you mar your colour with an ill countenance: and when you speak, you counterfeit such a kind of lispings, that you cannot bring out a wise word. Your Bodies are made so strait, and your fardingale so great, that instead of a woman, you may make an Antick of your self. I am plain, but tell you the truth, I think you are best in your quiting Coat; for your tricing and your tiring takes away all your proportion, so that the Painter and the Taylor hath put Nature out of countenance. But since it is the fashion for wits to wear a Cocks-comb, let them wear feathers that list, I will not blow them away: but as a good friend let me tell you, that tells you but for your good, be honest and be hanged, let knavery go to the Devil, stand not lering in your way, no; devils lies to make fools, no; use tricks to pick Pockets, for in the end it will be naught; for the Woe of the Gallows, or the Devil will be the reward of plain Treachery, if in the way you scape beggary; and therefore follow my counsel, give over betimes, before it give over you. And since I have turned my Coat, turn your old Colow, and we will joyn together, to go both in a Liberty; for say the word, and I am for thee: and so till I hear from thee, I commend me to thee, Thine if thou wilt. D. T.

Her Answer.

YOU wicked Villain, hast thou played the Jew so long, that thou art weary of thy self, and now comest to me for a companion? Dost snatch, your trick is an Ace out; and of all the Cards, I love not a Knave. My beauty is not for blar eyes, no; shall pretended honesty cheat me folly. Hast thou had these occupations, and none thrive; a Dealer, a Parasite, and a Vandal, and now wouldst be Conger-catcher;

rather, wit, I have no game for your Ferret, and therefore hunt further. Now for my lars and my looks, and my tricks, and my toys, if they fit not your humour, I am not for you; but for the Fox, the Cal-toves, and the Devil, and the Ale-house, keep you from them, and I will keep me from you; and if I thought I might trust thee, I would put in a fools Parable: but if thou art not afraid of Sparrow-blasting, come home and take a birds nest; which if it be better then a Woodcock, thank the Heavens for the good Fortune, and me for my good will: and so till I see thy liberty, I leave thee to thy self,

Thine if I like, M. T.

A kind Sister to her loving Brother.

My dear Brother, as you know our love began almost in our Cradles, so I pray let it continue to our Graves. I have had a bad husband, and you no good wife, and yet with patience we have lived to see the strange changes of time: But we must one day walk after our friends, and therefore in the mean time let us make much of one another. Write unto me how you do in body and mind, and when I shall be so happy as to enjoy your good company: For being alone, you may be as a Husband and a Brother, to controule my servants, and comfort my self. Believe me, I long to see you, and in the mean time to hear from you: and therefore I pray you let no messenger pass from you, without some few lines of your kind love, which are as dear as my life. This I pray you let me not fail of. And so with my hearty commendations, and most kind love, in my daily prayers for thy health, I leave thee to the Almighty, Thy very loving Sister, A. N.

Hi. Answer.

Sweet Sister, I have received your loving Letter, for which I return you many kind thanks. My body I thank God is in good health, but my mind somewhat out of temper: for I see three things that do much grieve me; a Fool rich, a Wise man wicked, and an Honest man poor: For the first either by Prodigality wastes himself, or like a Dog in a Bench-holt hoards up his money he knows not for whom: the second turns wit to an evil course, that might compass better matters: And the third lives in grief, that he cannot shew the vertue of his condition. But when I consider again there is no Paradiſe, the Angels live in Heaven, and Hell is too near unto the Earth. I am glad I can ſall to prayer, to ſhine the traps of the deceitful, and ſince I cannot go from the route of Fates, to take my fortune as patiently as I can. You ſay well, we have lived to ſee much, and yet muſt die when we have ſeen all; you are rid of a trouble, and I well freed of a torment, yet are theſe croſſes enough to try the care of a good conſcience, in which I doubt not your wiſdome, nor ſhall you of my will: But as patience is a ſalve of my miſery, ſo is love the joy of Nature; in which as we are nearly linked, ſo let us live inſeparable. Shortly I hope to ſee you. The Lord of Heaven bleſs you, and his mercy keep you. So with my hearts love to you, to the Lords tuition I leave you.

Your very loving Brother, E. N.

A young man to his firſt Love.

Sweet Love, ſince firſt I viewed your fair beauty, I ſaw none like you, nor like any but you. My reaſon is beaten out of many grounds, and all in your graces: For firſt, your beauty being ſuch as exceedeth my commendation, your wit too high for my reaſon to reach, and your demeanour ſo diſcreet, as drives me only to wonder. Believe my affection to be untouched with untruth, and requite my love with ſome token of your good liking: For being the firſt Star that hath made me ſtudy Astronomy, let me not live in the clouds of your diſcomfort, leſt in a miſt of miſery I fall to the loweſt of Fortune. Leaving therefore my ſelf to your favour, or my death to your frown, I reſt reſtleſs, till I may reſt, Yours owely in all, T. P.

Her Answer.

If your heart were in your eyes, and your words were all truth, I ſhould believe a ſtrange tale of the great force of fancy; but I muſt intreat your pardon to paſſe upon my judgment of your opinion. I would I ſtole as you write me, though I did not requite you as you wiſh me: For though I would not be unkind, yet will I not be uncareful. Astronomy is too high a ſtudy for my capacity, and the Clouds are fitteſt Dwellings for them that are ſo high minded that the Earth cannot hold them. In brief therefore, build no caſtles in the air, leſt they happen to fall on your neck, diſtruſt not your fortune where your affection is faithful, not put your life to Loves passion, lest it try your patience too much. Howsoever it be, carry reason in all your courses, and your care will have the comfort; to which I wish you as much hope as a true heart may deserve: and so not knowing your rest, will trouble you no further, but rest as I have reason,

Yours in good will, A. M.

A Traveller beyond the Seas to his Wife in England.

DEAR Wife, the misery of my Fortune is more than can easily be born, and yet the most grief is to be absent from thee, and my little ones: but as a Hen to her Chickens, be kind to them till I see thee, and pray for my success, as I do for thy health. From many dangers God hath delivered me; and I hope will after many storms send me a fair day to do me good, and a fair wind to bring me home. In the mean time I will have patience, and intreat thee the like; for love so long settled, I know cannot lose his nature: And therefore not doubting of thy constancy, I command me to thy kindness; kiss my Wives for me, and kindly receive for thy self and them, such tokens as by this trusty Post I send thee and them. And thus hoping of thy health, as my hearts greatest happiness in this world, in prayer for the same, and thee, and thine, evermore I rest,

Amsterdam the 20 of August, 1652.

Thy dear loving Husband, T. W.

Her Answer.

SOFT-heart, let me intreat thee to be as merry as thou canst in spite of Fortune and her fury; for if thou haste but life to bring thee home, yet love shall bid thee welcome: my prayers and thy little ones are daily for thee. We all long to see thee, and think it long to be so long without thee: but knowing thy intent for our good, we will have patience till thy coming, and pray for the speed of it, with good success of thy travel. The Posts hast is great, and therefore I must end. For thy kind Letters and tokens I thank thee. Somewhat by this Bearer I have sent thee, my notes in my Letter will tell you what, with my hearts love, which can hold nothing from you, but aboweth all I am, and have ready for you. So with my Wives kiss, and my own, in prayer for thy health and hearts ease, I commit thee to the Almighty.

London the 23 of September, 1652.

Thy very loving Wife, E. W.

A Letter admonitory to his friend in Love.

Honest Wilkin, I cannot but mourn for thee, to see thee in such a passion, as I thought never to have taken thee in. I hear say thou art in love; is it possible to be true, that the spirit of error could ever have taken possession of thy wit, to make a Saint of an Fool, and lose thy self in a maze? Why, first the thing Love is another world than this, and hath little to do with such Creatures as thou keepest company with. I am sorry to hear how thou windest thy self in such a Net, that thou canst no way get loose. Fie upon folly, leave thy fancy, lest it be too late, and then no man will pity thee. What, have both eyes, and be stark blind; ears, and hast heard nothing; nose, and can smell nothing; a wit, and can perceive nothing; and a heart that can feel nothing, to put thee from this new nothing, which thou hast met with, called Love? Why, let me tell thee what it is, simply I cannot tell thee; but what are the qualities of it, as I have heard and read of it, I will deliver thee: It will cuckold Age, beset Youth betray Beauty, and waste Wealth; dishonour Vertue, and work Willany. This kind of love I mean, that makes thee dance Crenchmore without a Pipe, it will not let one sleep, nor eat, nor drink, nor stand, nor sit in quiet. It will teach a Fool to flatter, a Knave to lie, a Wench to dance, and a Scholar to be a Poet, before he can hit the way of a kind verse. It will make a Souldier lazy, a Courtier wanton, a Lawyer idle, a Merchant poor, and a Poor man a Begger. It will make a wise man a Fool, and a Fool quite out of his wits. It will make a man womanish, and a woman apish: To be short, there is so much ill to be said of it, that he is happy that hath not to do with it. If therefore thou be not too far gone, come back again; if thou canst leave thy Study, lay away thy Book, and think of other matters then the mouth of Venus, lest Mars be angry, or Vulcan play the Willain, when Cupid shall be whipt for shooting away of his Arrows. In fine, give over thy humour, for it is no better then a fancy; and live but with me but a day, and thou wilt be in hate with it all night: For the desire is fleshly, and the delight is filthy; the suit is costly, and the fruit of it but folly. Leave Beauty to the Painter to help him in his Art, wit to the Scholar, to help the weakness of his Memory, and wealth to the Merchant to increase his Stock, Cases to the Lawyer to help his Pleading, Honour to the Souldier to put forth his Valour, and so let thy Distrels be divided among them; and when they are altogether by the ears, come thou away to me, and live with me, and credit me, thou wilt in the end thank me for dealing so truly and plainly with thee: In the mean time let me hear from thee, what I shall hope of thee; for as thou knowest I love thee; from my love I have written to thee, what I know is good for thee, and what I wish may do good with thee. And thus till I see thee, in hearty prayers for thee, and like commendations to thee, to the Lord of Heaven I leave thee, Tine as thou knowest, J. E.

The Answer.

GOOD Goose eat no more Hay; what a noise hast thou made with keeking at nothing; Thou hast heard thou knowest not what, and talkest thou knowest not how; take Woodcock in a spring, and touch not me with these terms. Now for thy mourning; let it be for the loss of thy wit; for I have no fear of Had-I-wist. Love (quoth he) you never knew what it is, and yet speak so much of it; either you wrong it or your self, that you no better understand it; or let me tell you, you are mistaken in it. It is the light of beauty, the bliss of Nature, the honour of reason, and the joy of time, the comfort of age, and the life of youth: It is a tongue of truth, stay of wit, and the rule of understanding: It is the guide of will, and the stay of sense: It makes a man kind, a woman constant, and while Frogs and Apes play at bo-peep for a Pudding, Lovers have a life they would not leave for a Mountain. Now for Mars and Venus, they are studies for School boys; and he that feareth Vulcan, let him be whipt for Cupid. To be short, thou art strangely out of tune to write me such a piece of Pusick; for were I but in the way, shall I turn back to thy whistle? No, thou knowest not what it is, and therefore talk no more of it: For hadst thou but once kindly had a taste of it, thou wouldst die ere thou wouldst leave it: believe it, I know it; and therefore for the derision of my Mistress, I will take it as a dream, and be sorry that awake thou hadst no more wit then to write it. But let all unkindness pass, it may be I will shortly see thee, and then make thee glad to yield to me, that thou art in a foul error, to wish me to leave my Love to live with thee. But since I know thy kindness, I will bear with thy weakness, and in the faith of an old friend hearken to thee in another matter: and so wishing thee no more to envy so much against a matter of so excellent a virtue, I will leave thee for this time, and rest all ways,

Thine as his own, R. P.

The Countrymans Letter to his beloved Sweet-heart.

TRuly Sweet-heart I am so out of order with my self, with the extremity of love that I bear you, that my heart is even at my mouth to say Sweet-heart, when I think on you: And if I hear but your name it makes me start as though I should see you; and when I look on my Handkerchief that you wrought me, I thank you, with Coventry Blew, O how I lift up my eyes to Heaven, and say to my self, O there is a Wench in the World, well go to: but when I see my Jet Ring that you sent me by your Brother Will, I do so kiss it, as if thou wert even with in it. O Nell, it is not to be spoken that affection I bear to thee; Why, I secreted all night for the Rabbet I lent thee, and have been in the Wood all day to seek a Birds nest for thee. My Mother is making a Cheese-Cake, and she hath promised it me for thee. Well, believe me, I love thee, and if my high Shoes come home on Saturday, I will see thee on Sunday, and we will drink together, that is once; for indeed I do love thee. Why, my heart is never from thee; for over and besides that I think on thee all the day, so I dream of thee all the night, that our folks say in my sleep that I call thee Sweet-heart, and when I am awake and remember my dream, I sigh and say nothing, but I would I wot what: But it is no matter, it shall be, and that sooner then some think; for the old Crust my Father, and the old Crumb my Mother will not come out with their Crowns, I care not, I am all their Sons, and therefore I shall have all the Lands; and having a good Farm we will make shift for money: And therefore Sweet-heart, (for so I will dare call thee) I pray thee be of good cheer, wash thy face, and put on the Globes that I gave thee, for we are full askt next Sunday, and the Sunday after you know what, for I have your Fathers good will, and you have my Mothers; if buckle and thong hold, we will load our packs together. I would have said some what else to you, but it was out of my head, and our School-master was so busie with his Boys, that he would scarce write thus much for me; but farewel, and remember Sunday.

Thine own from all the World. T. P.

An Answer to her heart of gold, and best beloved.

NOW Love, and a kind soul, I thank thee for thy Sweet Letter a thousand times; I warrant thee it hath been read, and read over again, oftner then I have fingers and toes: Every night I get up our man into my Chamber, and there by my Beds side he sits

And reads it to me still, till I am almost asleep: but when he reads so often Sweet-heart, and I love thee, O say I, you do lie, and he swears no: and then I said, I thank you Tom, no love lost, for I am no Changling: and when he comes to dream and awake, and wish, I will not tell you what I think yet. but one day I will tell you more; in the mean time be content and trust me. I have a band in hand for thee, that shall be done before the time; and let our friends do their wills, we will not hang after their humours: No, I am thine, and thou art mine; and that not for a day, but for ever and ever. My mother hath stoln a whole peck of flower for a Bride-cake, and our man hath sworn he will steal a brave Rosemary-bush, and I have spoken for Ale that will make a Cat speak, and the youths of the Parish have sworn to bring the blind Fidler: Well, be of good cheer, on Sunday I will be at Church, and if there be any dancing, I hope to have about with you, and till then the Sunday after, and every day after that, God be with you. Written by our man at my Beds side at midnight, when the folks were all asleep,

An angry Letter by a young Lover in the Country to his Love, M. N.

MArgery, the truth is you do not use me well; what do I get by you, to lose my days work, and sit at a stile blowing my fingers in the cold, in hope to meet you a milking, and you send another in your room, and go to market another way: Well, if I be not your Sweet-heart, much good do you with your choice: I hope my Fathers Son is worthy your Mothers Daughter. Your pricking in a clout is not so good as a Wdough, and for your portion I can have your betters: but it is no matter, he is curs'd in his cradle that trusts any of your words: and therefore since it is as it is, let it be as it will, I will not put that at my heart, that you hang at your heels. Well, to be short, take it for a warning, for I am angry; if you serve me so again, you shall serve me so no more, that is once: and therefore either be as you should, or be as you list, for I will not digest more then I can, that is the truth: Other folks take it as well as I, what a fool you make of me; but it is no matter, I may live to meet with you: But yet if you will give over your gadding, and be ruled by your friends counsel, I can be content to forget all that is past, and to be as good friends as ere we were. And so hoping to here better of you then some folks think of you, meaning to be at you Town the next Market day, if you will meet me at the Rose, we

we will have a Cake and a bottle of Ale, and may hap to be merry ere we part, and so farewel.

Your friend as you use me, B. D.

Her Answer.

BArnaby, you are much to blame to fall out with your self, for want of better company. If you are angry, turn the Buckle of thy Girdle behind you, for I know no body is in love with you. What's here to do with my Fathers Horse, and my Mothers Ware? Why? I wonder what you ail? is the Moon in the eclipse, that you are out of temper? Now, trath it is pity a Fool cannot have a little wit, but he will spend it all in a few words. Alas, the day, it will be night by and by, and if you be so peevish to put Pepper in the nose; if you can sneeze both ways, you are in no danger of death. Well, to be plain, care for your self if you will, for in truth I will take no charge of you. For if you will hold on your course, you may walk whither you will, and no body look after you: For my self, I will forget your name and proper person. I hope there is none so mad as to be in love with you. In conclusion, come not to me till I send for you, nor look after me till I bid you. I will drink no bottle Ale with such a bottle Nose, nor desire to come to Packet to meet such a companion: And so glad to have this occasion to try your patience, the Foremen of Fools be your Woodcock Father, and teach you better how to use your wit, if you have any. And so in as little love as I can, saving my charity, in hearty good will I leave you as I found you, and so I rest, Thine as thou knowest, M. N.

To her more friendly then faithful, Mr. Tho. Jewel.

ABitter sweet is a bitter physical potion: if I be so to your thoughts, I hope I shall purge your head of ill humours; and then faining Fancy, that would deceive plain Simplicity, will abuse neither of us: and if your flattery were not gross, in my complexion, I should have no respect of your condition; which how far it is from your protested truth, I leave to the secret confession of your little affection. Words follow thoughts at the heels, and thoughts keep the head, not the heart. Where the brain is a little troubled, it puts the wit much out of temper: and therefore wishing you to leave honour to the Noble, and service to the Wealthy, give me leave to the like of equality, and to settle my affection in discretion; which hating to disgrace the well deserving, cannot but daily favour the faithful. Distrust is a kind of jealousy, which if I could love, I should perhaps be acquainted with; but solitariness being a sweet life, why should I seek my hurt in a worse course? Yet am I not born for my self, and therefore will hearken to reason; and yet no further then to know the worth of a Jewel, before I pay too dear for the wearing of it: and therefore let this suffice you, that no Heaven being in this world, take heed of a Hell of your own making; and putting away the clouds of idle humours, look in the height of that, that by the direction of Vertue, may bring you to Honour: to which if my help may avail, I will say amen to such prayers, as may be made in a good mind; in which, hoping you will labour to rest, I leave you to your best rest, and so I rest,

Your friend as far as not to be my own enemy, S. P.

A valedictory Letter to an inconstant Mistress.

I Am sorry that mine own experience should so evidently prove the verity of that common received opinion, that Women generally are subject to inconstancy. Such was my confidence in you, and I made such solicitations to my self of your firmness, that I would have believed that a man might sooner remove the Rocks out of the Ocean, and the Mountains out of their station, then me out of your affections. How canst thou for shame cast thine eyes upon me, whose pure and exuberant Love thou hast rewarded with such fleeting disloyalty, and love a number: a King and a Lover march together in this, they can neither of them brook a Competitor or Cozribal. I will leave Partnership and Fraction to Merchants; but where I devote my intimate love to any Mistress, I expect a reciprocal and undivided affection. But as you have undeservedly alienated your affection, and extinguished that love, I thought nothing but death should have ended; so will I justly abandon your service, and here cease to write of love any more,

And rest a stranger, A. B.

A Packet of Letters.

An amorous Letter to a most fair Creature.

Though the Age be past, which drew her glorious stile from gods, yet never was any richer in persons than this present Age wherein she lives. Nature in former times did glory, when she had to send that matchless mouth of Poets; since her more skilful hands have produced your self as the better piece of her most absolute workmanship. What would I had as lost cause to commend your kindness, as I have to write these encomiums of your feature, which truly was not born to like and live to it less, but too to be enjoyed: and the praise of every good thing, and particularly in beauty, lies in its commendation and participation unto others. Wherefore exempte not your favour from me your most faithful servant, who can no more sustain my life in the want of your kindness, than the Earth can remain fruitful in the Spans continual absence. Weak words are not able to comprehend the immensity of my love, which leadeth to the consideration of your rash judgement, in hope of your sole comfort, to whom the endeavour of my self, and the constancy of my faith are eternally devoted, I kiss,

In the depth of true affection, R. S.

A Letter gratulatory to a kind Gentlewoman.

Good Mistress,

This posting Messenger (yet not so expeditious as the winged Pegasus) relinquishing in all haste this our Town of Lincoln, to transport himself to your famous City of London, the Center of great Britain, I could not let pass so fit an opportunity, to declare unto you how much the remembrance of your by-past kindness hath bound me, to wish you the highest degree of all terrestrial happiness. But looking at your favours with a remunerating desire, I find the number of them so great, and the greatness so hard to be expressed, much more to be recompensed, than like a vanquished man I am fain to yield and succumb under the burden of many arrears: onely at this present, like an humble Suppliant, I come to beg of you (the mother of opportunity) some more time, until by the smiles of Fortune, and the diligence of my indefatigable endeavours I be enabled to make requital: but hoping that thus much may persuade you, that I have not buried you in the pit of oblivion, I conclude and rest as I am bounden, Yours ever to be commanded, N. I.
